Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure. Before the Senator puts the question I wish him distinctly to understand that our State is a prohibition State, and I am not an expert on many things the Senator might be, coming from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I had no purpose of accusing the Senator of being an expert in the respect of which he speaks; but I wish to ask the Senator a question. He spoke of whisky at about 60 cents a gallon. What is it that is sold for 60 cents a gallon?

Mr. McCUMBER. They will take whisky that is three-fourths water and put in a little of this elixir, a little of this agene, and whisky that is not worth 60 cents a gallon they will sell for 10-year-old whisky and change the value of it to the consumer.

Mr. SPOONER. I had in mind the fact that whisky is subject to a tax of $1.20 a gallon, and I did not understand what the Senator meant.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is on good whisky, "proof whisky," as it is called. This is simply a manufactured product. It is made out of cheaper wines as well. Now, here is another extract from this paper:

Ryeoline is exceedingly concentrated. One and a quarter ounces are sufficient for a barrel of 40 gallons and will impart the nutty bouquet aftertaste; equal to 5 gallons of best high-grade stock whisky used in blending. The use of ryeoline at a cost of 30 cents per barrel is a saving of $15 to $25 per barrel of old stock whisky, with results equally as good (so pronounced by good judges).

I have not gone over this entire list. I simply call the attention of Senators to the fact, showing the frauds that are being perpetrated and something of the character of those frauds.

Now, who else are opposing this bill? Wine merchants.

Doctor Bigelow testified a short time ago before the Senate Committee on Manufactures that he had been sent to examine some of the importations of wine into the United States. There seem to be quite a number of wholesalers in Philadelphia. He went down and visited the wholesale district and was very much surprised to find that there was rarely stock on hand; in very few of them was there any stock on hand. He went to one of the proprietors and asked for a certain brand of wine. The price was quoted to him. It was an imported wine. He also asked for other brands, and they quoted different prices according to the general market for the different kind of brands.

But before he got through he ascertained that not less than twelve or fifteen kinds of wine were practically all drawn from the same cask; that the wine was not imported wine at all; that the wholesaler or importer would simply go to one drawer and get a little statement that the particular wine was manufactured in such a place in Italy, and another in Spain, and another in France; and he could have any character of imported wines in any quantity he desired by simply pulling out a little drawer and getting the proper little piece of paper to paste upon his bottle.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand my friend from North Dakota to say that this is imported foreign wine.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I said it was not imported.

Mr. PERKINS. It is done by the importer. I want him to exempt from his criticism California wines. We have many thousands of vineyards in California which are producing grapes from which are being manufactured pure wine—port, sauterne, claret, and other varieties of wine—and you can take only one good quality and one variety of wine from the same cask or the same vineyard. The wine growers of California are in favor of this bill or any other pure-food measure that will give a market to our California wines and to our pure olive oil that is not adulterated with cotton-seed oil, and the jellies and jams and other products of our State. As my friend did not refer to California, I want him to understand that the wine makers and grape growers in California are in favor of this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to speak of California wines before I get through. I may as well state what I intended to say right here, and I can do it publicly. In the examination that was given before the Committee on Manufactures a year or two ago it was shown that the champagne manufactured in California was not only equal but superior to any champagne imported into the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, in the case of the best French wines many of the favorite brands we now import into this country the wines originated in California. They were sent to France, there bottled, and with French labels returned here. If my friend from North Dakota was not a temperance man and if he purchased wine he would be paying tribute to the manufacturers in France for their imported wines.

Mr. KEAN. In crossing the ocean the voyage improved it?

Mr. PERKINS. No; it was the French label.

Mr. McCUMBER. In addition, here is another class of so-called importers who are opposed naturally to this bill. I have no doubt but that cotton-seed oil is superior for cooking purposes, and possibly for the human system, to any lard that can be produced. People may differ upon that subject; but I submit that it ought not to be sold either for lard or for olive oil when it is not so, and the public should not be deceived into purchasing it as such.

The same authority, Doctor Bigelow, also examined a number of the imported olive oils; and here I wish to correct a mistake. It has generally been assumed that we are shipping our cotton-seed oil into France; and there it is bottled and mixed sometimes with olive oil; but ordinarily it is sent here without being mixed at all, and it is branded with a French label and sold in this country for olive oil, when it is nothing more than the cotton-seed oil that is used in this country. The reason for arriving at this conclusion is because the foreign brand is on the bottle, but, as a matter of fact, Mr. President, it is bottled here and the foreign brand is placed upon the bottle here, and it has never been shipped, and it is nothing more than cotton-seed oil after all.

The same testimony was given in reference to some importers or so-called "importers" at Brooklyn. For instance, Doctor Bigelow went there and asked for a number of foreign brands of olive oil. The prices were quoted to him. It was ascertained also before he got through in that case that the party did not import any oils whatever, but simply took cotton-seed oil and labeled it with a foreign brand and sold it to the country generally as imported olive oil.

Now, Mr. President, that is the character of manufacturers, and the only ones, so far as I know, who are particularly opposing this bill. There is some opposition by the manufacturers of jellies, etc., who seem to be frightened lest it shall be decided by the courts that the coloring matter which they use, which is almost always an aniline or coal-dye product, will prevent their goods from going into interstate commerce. I do not think they have anything to fear, because the courts must apply a rule such as this: That in order that any food coloring may be deemed to be deleterious it must be so, considering the quantity that would naturally be used by an ordinary person, as that it could without any question be shown to be deleterious. That is not a very hard proposition for any manufacturer to come up against. If it is of a coloring matter that would injure people generally as they would naturally use this jelly or that jelly, then it ought not to go into the markets, and as to whether it is or not, the courts can easily decide that question.

The provisions of this bill, Mr. President, are practically the same as they have been for the last four years. There is substantially no difference whatever. There are some slight additions and modifications. I think when Senators commence to study it out, while I have no doubt many of them will consider that it ought to be modified, those who have had the bill in charge will cheerfully agree to such suggestions as they may make with the intent to secure such a bill as will be satisfactory, and it will result in the final passage of a bill that will meet the purpose desired. It is not drastic in any of its provisions.

There is a matter that was discussed here the other day, and I especially desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, who took part in that discussion, to it. It was upon the word "knowingly." We may look over the pure-food bills of most of the States—I will take Kentucky, for instance, as the standard, because I believe that the people of Kentucky have a better food law than any other State in the Union, taken as a whole.

The word "knowingly" is not generally used in these prohibitions. I have heard of no dire effects because of the omission of that word in nearly all of the food laws of the States. I desire to say freely to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am afraid the result of the insertion of the word "knowingly" into the section in which I believe it was inserted the other day will open wide the gates for any person almost to escape; that it throws a shield around the person who would desire to disobey the law as it would finally be in this bill.

Now, what is the necessity of the word "knowingly," as applied, we will say, to the retail dealer? Of course, it will be claimed that he has no knowledge of the inferiority, of the misbranding, or of the adulteration of the articles that he uses, and, therefore, that he should be protected by the use of the word "knowingly." But if the Senator will look at the whole bill it will be seen that the retail dealer is absolutely protected, because from the wholesale houses or the manufacturers with whom he deals he may secure, as a condition precedent to his purchase, a simple guaranty in writing that the goods conform to the laws of the United States and particularly to this act. When he has done that he is absolutely protected without any possible question.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that point——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. How is the guaranty from the wholesaler to protect the retailer if he is found guilty and is fined and imprisoned according to the terms of this bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. According to the terms of the bill he can not be found guilty and imprisoned if he has that guaranty.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not sure about that.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is certainly the provision of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 10.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. I appreciate the force of the argument of the Senator from North Dakota as to the danger of an improper use of the word "knowingly" in a bill of this kind. The Senator entirely misapprehends my attitude if he thinks that I intended to advocate that qualification everywhere in his proposed statute. I suggested one place in which the commonest kind of justice to the people of the United States seemed to me to require that that word should be inserted, and it arose out of this provision to which the Senator from Idaho refers, in section 10:

> That no dealer shall be convicted under the provisions of this act when he can establish a guaranty signed by the wholesaler, jobber, manufacturer, or other party residing in the United States, from whom he purchases such articles, to the effect that the same is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, designating such article.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator I did not understand that the word "knowingly" was limited to that particular condition.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me finish:

> Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of such articles to such dealer, and in such case said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach, in due course, to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

Under that provision of the bill the domestic dealer, the dealer in the United States, may protect himself by the guaranty of a domestic manufacturer, but what about the dealer who purchases from a foreign manufacturer? He is not protected by the insertion of the qualifying word "knowingly," and yet he is the man above all others who should have the protection carried by that word thrown around him. Why? We have laws under which the Department, so large that I do not know how fitly to characterize it in respect to almost everything that is going on in this country—the Agricultural Department—investigates many things and certifies as to the healthfulness of many things. The Treasury Department also has many functions of that sort. Now, I ask the Senator if it be not true that no imported food, liquor, or the third article mentioned here, can be released from the custody of the custom-houses until the Government officials have analyzed it, or a sample of it, and found it to conform to the law or to be free from poisonous ingredients, and so forth? That is true, is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well. Now, Mr. President, every citizen of the United States has a right to assume that the men at tide water, at the ports of entry, paid by the United States to make examinations and analyses of these imported articles, have done their duty, and it is a travesty on law, on good administration, on decency, that a man who buys and sells, believing that the Government officials at the custom-houses have done their duty under their oaths, shall be held down under penalty of imprisonment or fine if they shall not have done their duty, while men who buy from domestic manufacturers are protected immediately by a guaranty.

So I said to my friend from Idaho that I thought the amplest justice to our people (for this bill is full of pitfalls for the unwary as almost any bill of the kind must be) required us to protect those who act in good faith as far as it is possible; and I suggest to my friend that as to the dealers who put upon the market articles imported which had already passed the scrutiny of the Government officials, he ought to insert the qualifying word "knowingly." I thought he agreed to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the only instance.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that the bill as reported contains the word "knowingly," page 2, line 22, and the controversy the other day was simply as to how far that word was applicable to another provision of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I had not read the bill, and I asked the Senator whether it had been incorporated.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was in the bill as reported. It was merely a grammatical distinction.

Mr. SPOONER. So the Senator from North Dakota understands just what I meant by the insertion of the word "knowingly."

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to the word "knowingly," as applied to those cases. I considered that the domestic retailer was sufficiently protected under the provisions of the guaranty, and the other was already in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. It was not in the bill last winter.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is in this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked the Senator from Idaho, who has charge of the bill, the other day whether it was in the bill now. He said it was, and I was satisfied; but some question arose as to whether it ought not to be again inserted in order to apply more fully to the case I am stating.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to its being inserted at that particular place, but my objection was urged against the insistence not only as I understood in the debate the other day, but as I know in the debate which took place at the close of the last session, that the word "knowingly" should be inserted as a protection against all the retailers.

There is a law against selling adulterated milk. No one ever heard of our insistence that the word "knowingly" should be inserted. If that were done, as I said, it would open the gate for the escape of almost everyone of these dealers. We have in our State, as I said, a prohibitory law against the sale of intoxicating liquors. To meet that law nearly all the great brewers have manufactured what they call "Pabst's malt" or somebody else's malt. A few bottles are taken to the saloons—where we have them in our State. I admit that we have them, but there are very few of them. Then immense quantities of beer, purely intoxicating liquors, are shipped to the same vendor; and, while he may have this malt upon his shelf, the great bulk of his sales, and practically all his sales, are nothing more than the ordinary beer that is brewed at those great breweries.

Now, when he is arrested, charged with the sale of these intoxicating liquors, he always falls back upon the proposition that he understood it was all this malt and he did not know he was selling any real beer whatever; he did not know that it was intoxicating.

We have our proposed law so framed that that excuse can not be made, and I know of no reason, Mr. President, why you should open wide the gates for fraud of that character. If we use the word "knowingly" in all cases of that kind in our statutes against offenses of this character, then practically all the defendant would have to do would be to substitute the crime of perjury for the crime of which he was charged, and he would go scot-free.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. MALLORY. How much longer does the Senator from North Dakota desire to speak?

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall not complete my remarks to-day, but I should like to spend about three minutes in one explanation, and then I will close.

Mr. MALLORY. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from North Dakota concludes his remarks.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] a few moments ago was to the effect that this bill is full of pitfalls for the unwary. I wish to say candidly to the Senator from Wisconsin that I do not believe he could make or conceive of a bill that was intended to accomplish a certain object that is more carefully drawn to protect the innocent or unwary. Now, how is this done? In the first place, every offense must be tried by the court. How does it get to the court? The Secretary of Agriculture may make an examination of the chemical, he may make examination of the drugs and the foods and the liquors that are manufactured for interstate commerce. If he himself concludes that any food or any drug does not measure up to the standard that is required in these definitions—and they are standards based upon common sense and common judgment—he does not immediately direct the arrest of the manufacturers, but he is required to give them notice that in his opinion, and upon a chemical examination of their products, they do not comply with the law. A hearing is then given to the manufacturers and the testimony taken; and if the manufacturers themselves satisfy the Department that their products are pure, that they are wholesome, that they are not adulterated, that they are not misbranded, that is the end of it.

If they seriously differ, then the testimony is simply submitted to the United States district attorney, and there a second safeguard is thrown around it. The United States district attorney does not need to act even upon the advice of the Secretary of Agriculture, but he investigates the subject himself and determines in his own mind whether or not it is a case that ought to be prosecuted. If he finds and believes that in a court he can establish beyond any reasonable doubt that the manufacturers are guilty of the offense, he may then institute the proper proceeding. Then it has to go before the grand jury, and they again will have to act upon the same subject. Even then, if it be found that he is selling an unwholesome or adulterated article, he must still produce in court this little guaranty from the party from which he purchased, which would be a complete defense.

If anyone can possibly conceive of any method by which an innocent manufacturer or dealer may be more fully protected than is contained in the provisions of this bill, I certainly should like to hear from him.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, the bill S. 529, which is now before the Senate, is the result of the labor of a combined Commission of Senators and Members of the House, which covered a period of something over a year. It is a better bill, in my judgment, than any we have had on the same subject since I have been in this body; but it is defective in certain essentials, so defective, in my judgment, that I am constrained, Mr. President, to register my vote against it.

Preliminarily, and before referring to the subject-matter of the bill, I would call attention to the parliamentary question involved in its presentation to the Senate at this time. The eighth section of the bill provides distinctly for raising revenue. It declares—

> That a duty of 8 cents per net ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 80 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry by sea on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, or Newfoundland; and a duty of 16 cents per net ton, not to exceed in the aggregate $1.60 per net ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry by sea on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any other foreign port or place, not, however, to include vessels in distress or not engaged in trade.

There is a sweeping imposition of a tax, and, in the estimation of the framers of the bill, there is no question but that they regarded it as a tax for the purpose of raising revenue. The title of the bill itself declares that its purpose is—> to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

In his report upon the bill the chairman of the Commission, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], called attention to the fact that—

> The practical result of the proposed bill in the first year of its operation will manifestly be to increase the revenue of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, if it is so that this bill provides for raising revenue it is premature, of course, for us to discuss it in other than an academic sense in this body at this time. It is only a few days since that the House of Representatives, on a bill that by no means was as pointed in its purpose to produce revenue, raised the point and sent it back to the Senate, and called attention to the fact that the Senate was precluded by the seventh section of Article I of the Constitution from initiating a revenue measure.

The declarations of the chairman of the Commission and the statements contained in the title of the bill are not, however, conclusive, and whether it is a measure for the purpose of raising revenue which should originate in the House of Representatives and should not be considered in this body until after it has come here from the House of Representatives is a matter that can be determined only by a comparison of the provisions of the eighth section with the requirements as laid down by the decisions of the courts.

I am not prepared to say, Mr. President, that I am ready to relinquish the right of the Senate to originate and pass such a measure as this. I am inclined to think that it is an open question, notwithstanding the somewhat severe criticisms which have been passed upon similar legislation in other quarters; but it is a subject that we should proceed with carefully and deliberately, and while I am perfectly willing to expedite the discussion of this measure as much as possible, I shall, when the proper time comes, raise the point and present for the consideration of the Senate the point of order as to whether this is such a measure as we can originate without violating the inhibition of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution.

I shall not discuss the fact whether this is or is not a bill for the purpose of raising revenue, but I shall call attention to an extract from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Twin City Bank v. Nebeker, in 167 United States, which was quoted here the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in the discussion of this question. I ask the attention of the Senate to the language which the court uses, and which, in my judgment, is somewhat ambiguous. In the latter part of the quotation made by the Senator from Wisconsin we have the following:

> The main purpose that Congress had in view was to provide a national currency based upon United States bonds, and to that end it was deemed wise to impose the tax in question. The tax was a means for effectually accomplishing the great object of giving to the people a currency that would rest primarily upon the honor of the United States and be available in every part of the country. There was no purpose by the act or by any of its provisions to raise revenue to be applied in meeting the expenses or obligations of the Government.

The implication is that if there were such a purpose—that is, a purpose of raising revenue to be applied in meeting the expenses or obligations of the Government—then it would be a tax for the purpose of raising revenue and obnoxious to that prohibition in the seventh section of Article I of the Constitution.

It would seem, Mr. President, that this section 8 is for the purpose of raising revenue with the object of meeting the obligations of the Government, which obligations are distinctly set forth in this bill, the obligation of the subsidy to ships and the subvention or payment or bounty to the "naval reserves," as they are called.

Contenting myself upon that point with just simply calling attention to it, as I have done, I will take up the bill. Before doing so, however, I desire to express my resentment at the evident tendency on the part of those who advocate measures of this kind to imply by their utterances that anyone opposed to their contention is necessarily an enemy to the reconstruction or rehabilitation of the merchant marine of the country.

I yield to no man, Mr. President, in my earnest desire to rehabilitate the merchant marine, and I resent that tendency, which to me is apparent, at least on the part of the advocates, not alone in Congress, but elsewhere, of a subsidy system of building up the merchant marine to imply that opposition to that subsidy system necessarily means opposition to the construction of a merchant marine for this country. I am sincere in believing, Mr. President, that such a subsidy or subvention as is contained in the second section of this bill, and as is carried out in the third section by certain provisions, is unconstitutional—that it can not be plausibly sustained by anything that is in the Constitution, and that the subvention or subsidy will in practice prove an absolute failure, so far as the accomplishment of the purpose designed is concerned.

In the first place, the amount which is donated is too small. It is an effort here to take from the Treasury money and put it into the pockets of private parties for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their private business, but it does not give them enough to accomplish the purpose aimed at. Five dollars a ton, in my judgment—and I know it can be demonstrated—for twelve months' service in running a ship of any size is entirely too small an amount to meet the disparity which exists between the operating expenses and the original cost of vessels in the United States and vessels under foreign flags. I do not believe, Mr. President, that $10 a ton would be sufficient to meet that disparity and put the American ship on an equality with the foreign ship. I do not believe that any measure which falls absolutely short of putting American ships in such shape that we can run them without any expense whatever to the owner of the ships would amount to anything in the line of subsidy; but I do not believe Congress will ever reach the point where such a measure as that will pass.

Upon that point I have some figures which were handed to me by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] yesterday from one of his constituents whom I happen to know. He is the owner of a vessel and has figured a little on this question. He was a witness before the Merchant Marine Commission at Galveston last year. He is the owner of a small sailing vessel—a schooner. Her name is the John Francis. She cost $16,000 when five years old. Her original cost was $24,000. She is 330 tons gross measurement. She would get $5 a ton for twelve months' service in the year, which would be $1,650 a year, which is about 10 per cent on her cost when five years old. Her running expenses—he speaks of his own vessel and he knows—amount to $25 a day, equal to the sum of $9,125 a year—that would be, under ordinary conditions, $9,125 a year for running an ordinary vessel of that size, her ordinary expenses under almost any flag.

The operating expenses of running an American vessel, as testified to by almost everybody who appeared before the Merchant Marine Commission, would be at least 30 per cent greater than those of a foreign ship. He is out 30 per cent on that $9,125, which amounts to $2,737.50. This bill proposes to give him $1,650, leaving him $1,087.50 to the bad if he wants to compete with the average foreign vessel.

He also happens to be interested in a steam vessel. He has furnished figures on that. She is under the Norwegian flag. He had put that vessel under the Norwegian flag because he could not afford to run her under the American flag. It is in testimony before the Commission, testified to by gentlemen of standing and repute, that if they were presented with a five or six thousand ton American steamer free of all cost they would not be able to run her at a profit under existing conditions; that the operating expenses are so much more burdensome on the American ship than they are under a foreign flag that they would be forced to put the ship under some foreign flag or else sell her. This vessel under the Norwegian flag, plying between Galveston and the Central American coast, of 750 tons net, 1,200 tons gross, cost $90,000 in England; if built in America, she would have cost $130,000, according to his estimate, which I think is a fair and reasonable one and probably within what the facts really are. The difference would be $40,000. Her running expenses under the Norwegian flag are $70 a day, which amounts to $25,550 a year. Under the American flag she would be operated at an expense of $100 a day, making a total of $36,500 a year, leaving a difference of $10,950, and from the Government under this subsidy she would receive $6,000, leaving her $4,950 to the bad, which would have to be filled up in some other way.

I have done a little figuring myself on this subject. I happen to know something about ships. I have taken as an illustration a 2,000-ton vessel, a steamship. I think I am strictly within reasonable limits when I say that her expense would amount to $125 a day, or $45,000 per annum, one-third of which would be $15,000, American disparity. That is, our expense of operating is, in my judgment, about 33⅓ per cent greater than what it is under a foreign flag. So our American owner would have to pay $15,000 more than the foreigner, and would get on his 2,000-ton ship $5 a ton, or $10,000, to assist him in carrying on the operations of his ship.

I think if you take any sized ship and figure on it, using the figures which we have given us by this bill, you will find the amount is too small to compensate for the difference between the expense incident to construction and operation of an American ship and that incident to the construction and operation of a foreign vessel.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. If it will not interfere with the line of argument which the Senator from Florida is now pursuing, I should like him to state in what lies the difference of cost in operating an American vessel and a foreign vessel.

Mr. MALLORY. In a great many ways. I endeavored when I was on the Commission to elicit from witnesses capable of giving the information all that they could give on that subject. In the first place, our food is much more expensive than that of the foreign vessel; in the second place, the accommodations aboard American ships are more luxurious—if I may use such an expression in connection with anything in a sailor's life—they are certainly roomier, and under the practice of our merchant marine on board our steamships they require quite a considerable number more men in the engine room than do the foreign vessels—in some instances five or six more men in vessels of the same size are required under the American flag than under a foreign flag.

In addition to that, the high wages of American seamen and of American masters, mates, engineers, and assistant engineers are also very important items in making up this difference. You take the master of a four or five thousand ton British ship, and he will probably get $125 a month, while the master of an American ship of the same size would not be satisfied with less than $150 a month. I am satisfied that he would not be at all content with that. I had a friend who was master of a 1,200-ton American ship. He quit because he was only getting $150 a month and his owners would not give him any more. British masters of vessels of two or three or four thousand tons, I might say, frequently are not getting that much. The scale runs clear down to the lower men in the engine room and through the officers. The result is that, according to the testimony of shipowners, the men who are engaged in that business, I think we can safely say that the expense of operating American ships is at least 33⅓ per cent more than it is in the case of even the British ship, which is the next expensive ship to the American ship.

When you come down to the Norwegian and Italian ships, those vessels are run so much more cheaply that no comparison at all can be made. I have known a Norwegian captain getting $75 a month on a 1,500-ton saling ship. An American would not think of accepting such wages. He would not think of less than $150 a month.

I was proceeding, Mr. President, to call attention to the provisions of the bill. The first section provides for the organization of a naval reserve. The first section has been modified since the filing of the report of the minority of the Committee on Commerce on this measure, and I think the modification of that section has been to its benefit. It provides for a payment to be made to all men who will enlist or allow themselves to be enrolled in the naval reserve under such rules and regulations or requirements as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and it limits the enrollment to men who are native-born citizens of the United States or who are naturalized citizens. The bill as it was reported to the Senate a few days ago permitted men to be enrolled in the naval reserve who have merely declared their intention to become citizens of the United States.

The minority in their report inveighed against that quite vigorously, because, as they contended, it opened the door to the payment of money to men who were unworthy and who would declare their intention to become citizens of the United States merely for the purpose of getting the benefit of the pay as members of the naval reserve.

The second section provides what is known as a "general subsidy," or, what we may designate as a "bounty." It proposes that if a ship, whether she be a steamship or a sailing vessel, sails the ocean for twelve months and is engaged in the foreign trade, she is to receive at the expiration of the twelve months $5 per ton; and if she follows the foreign trade for a less period than twelve months, but exceeding nine months, she is to receive $4 per ton. The sum of $2.50 per ton is also given to any vessel which, during any twelve consecutive months, has been engaged in the foreign trade by sea or the deep-sea fisheries for a period of six months or over, but less than nine months. That is the subsidy.

Now, the framers of this bill—that is, those gentlemen who framed the bill and are advocating it, because I think I had something to do with the framing of the bill, though I am not advocating it—those gentlemen, in order to get Congress to swallow this bonus of a plain, bald donation to the owners of merchant vessels in order that the owners of the merchant vessels should carry on their business, and for the purpose of making it more palatable to Congress, deemed it desirable to prescribe certain alleged obligations or burdens that were to be assumed by a shipowner in consideration of the benefits given him under this second section. There are six distinct requirements exacted of the shipowners specified in the third section of the bill. I shall not, Mr. President, consume time in doing more than simply calling attention to that and also to the objections which I have to it. Section 3 begins in the following language.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the Senator passes to section 3, I should like to have a better understanding of sections 1 and 2. Are we to understand that section 1 is practically a subsidy to the men employed on the ships, and that sectoin 2 is a subsidy to the owners of the ships? Is that the distinction between the two?

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that section 1 provides for a naval reserve and provides for payments to the men in the naval reserve if they serve a certain length of time aboard American ships.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The purpose of that is to give them a larger wage than they would otherwise receive?

Mr. MALLORY. Well, it may be a combined purpose to give them a larger wage than they would otherwise receive, possibly, and also to give them an inducement to hold themselves in readiness, in the event of war, to go into the Navy. That is the object which the Commission had in organizing the naval reserve in this way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But take the case of an ordinary seaman. I observe that the amount given to him for each year would be $24. About what percentage would that be?

Mr. MALLORY. That amount has been increased since the bill was introduced. It has been increased by an amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the other day to $3 a month, or $36 per annum.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he thinks an addition of $36 per annum to the pay of these seamen will induce men to enter the service, with wages as high as they are now?

Mr. MALLORY. I doubt it very much. I have very grave question, Mr. President, in my mind whether this provision is going to amount to anything. I should like to see the experiment tried in some way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator another question? Assuming that the subsidy is to be paid, would it not be better to diminish the subsidy paid to owners of ships and to increase the subsidy paid to the men who work the ships? Would it not produce better results?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; but the Commission has proceeded on the theory that it is necessary to have ships in order to train your men; that you can not have your men unless you have your ships. My recollection is that the original thought was that this naval reserve should be confined to ships engaged in the foreign trade, but since then the idea has enlarged, so that it includes not only vessels engaged in the foreign trade, but in our domestic trade as well. I think that was because we realized that it was necessary to have as many vessels as possible on which the men could be trained. That is the object, I think, of this provision—to increase the number of vessels.

Mr. NEWLANDS. One question more, if the Senator will permit me. Can he form any idea of what amount in the total would have to be paid by the United States, under this bill, in subsidies to the men employed on the ships, and what would be paid to the owners of the ships?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir. I myself am not convinced, but the majority of the committee in their report—and I will refer the Senator to the page of that report—has made statements as to the net cost under the operations of this bill for the different years. He will find it on page 12.

They estimate the net cost for the second year for the naval volunteer retainers would amount to $300,000; for general subventions to cargo vessels, $1,250,000; for mail subventions to new lines, $1,500,000; for increased subventions to two existing mail lines, $467,000; total, $3,517,000. The net increase of revenue from tonnage, amounting to $1,850,000, is deducted, which reduces the net cost to the Treasury to $1,667,000. The Senator will find in the report that estimates for the third, fourth, fifth, and up to the tenth year are made by the committee, and that the estimate for the tenth year shows that the net cost of this scheme to the Treasury will be $7,682,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And is this bill only to be in operation for ten years?

Mr. MALLORY. No; the bill may go on forever—that is, so long as the country can stand it—and the expenditure increases every year until we get a merchant marine that will cover the seas of the world; but a vessel can draw a subsidy for only ten years. Right there it is a pertinent inquiry to those who advocate this bill, What are they going to do with these ten-year-old ships when they can not draw any more subsidy and can not compete with subsidized vessels?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. In former bills, which I have had the honor to advocate, there was a provision for contracts extending anywhere from ten to fifteen years. I have not examined the pending bill particularly, but I am inclined to think that there is no provision in it for contracts extending over ten years; and that it is left in the power of Congress to repeal this law at any time it is the pleasure of Congress to do so.

Mr. MALLORY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. FRYE. That is so.

Mr. MALLORY. If it should by any accident happen that a Democratic majority got into Congress within two years, or I will say four years, the probabilities are that the bill would be repealed and the unfortunate men who had gone into the shipowning business and provided themselves with ships would be found with a lot of ships on their hands which they expected to be subsidized, but which would be without any subsidy. That is one of the defects of this bill.

Mr. FRYE. I do not think this bill so good as the bills the Senate has passed heretofore.

Mr. MALLORY. Even with that defect, I think it is better than some of the others we have had. I merely mention that incidentally.

I was proceeding to say that the Commission thought it advisable to fortify this bounty feature of this bill, and so they have provided certain things which have to be done by the shipowner in order to justify this donation of $5 a ton. Those things are provided in the third section. I will call attention to the very serious and earnest way in which the bill provides that the shipowners should undertake certain obligations:

SEC. 3. That before receiving any subvention under the provisions of this act the owner or owners of any vessel shall contract, in writing, with sufficient sureties, with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to fulfill each and all of the following obligations.

Very important, so important that they have to have sureties. Now, the first of these obligations is:

First. That said vessel may be taken and used by the United States, for the national defense or for any public purpose, at any time, upon payment to the owner or owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, or a fair rate of hire to be agreed upon. And if there shall be a disagreement as to such fair actual value or fair rate of hire between the United States and the owner or owners of such vessel, then the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, they to select a third, who shall act in such appraisement in case the two shall fail to agree.

What does that mean, Mr. President? It means that if the Government of the United States in time of war, or in time of stress, needs the services of these vessels the owners of these vessels agree quite solemnly in writing that they will allow the Government to take them, provided the Government will pay the value of the vessels, which shall be fixed by impartial appraisers. I submit that without any such agreement the Government of the United States can do that, and it is entirely unnecessary to put that provision in here as a consideration from the shipowner in order to justify his receiving this bonus. It can be taken out of the bill, and yet the Government would have the same right in the event of war to use those vessels, either for colliers or for whatever purpose the Government might need them, on paying a reasonable compensation therefor, that it would have under this provision.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator how long he thinks it would take for the Government to adjudicate and settle a claim of this character so that the Government might get a ship? I judge from that provision that the Government could not get a ship until they had paid for it.

Mr. MALLORY. I am inclined to think that it would be an absolute necessity that payment should be made before we could touch a ship. I think that would be the case now, however.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Government in time of stress has the right to take property.

Mr. MALLORY. It has the physical power to do it, whether or not it has the moral or legal right.

Mr. TELLER. But the Government is under obligation then to pay for it. This provision would restrain the Government from taking it, no matter how great was the emergency.

Mr. MALLORY. Very possibly. I call attention to that provision simply because it strikes me as being only a make-weight—something put in there for the purpose of conveying the impression that the shipowner is going to do something of some value to the Government as a consideration for this bonus.

The second provision is:

Second. That said vessel shall carry, free of charge, the mails of the United States, when the Postmaster-General shall so require, for the whole or any part of a voyage for which subvention shall be claimed.

Vessels that are receiving a postal subsidy for transporting mail from this country to foreign countries are excluded from any of the benefits of this bill, and it is only the vessels that are not covered by postal subsidies that are to be treated by the Government as mail carriers under this provision.

But what class of vessels is it that reference is had to here? Mr. President, if you will read the report of the majority of the Commission you will find that the vessels contemplated to be built up and constructed under this provision of the bill are cargo carriers, tramps, corresponding to the tramps that do a great part of the commerce of the world, vessels ranging from 1,500 tons net to 3,000 tons, rarely larger, with a speed of from 8 to 10 knots—economical vessels carrying as small a number of men as possible. They are vessels that go to a port seeking cargo, without any ulterior destination in mind at the time they arrive at the port. They seek a cargo. They arrive at New York and get a cargo for Rio Janeiro, a cargo for Buenos Ayres, or for a port on the Mediterranean. It is indifferent to them. They will take a cargo wherever they can get a call.

Now, those vessels are slow. They have no certain destination until their charters are fixed. It strikes me as being absurd to think that they can ever be of any assistance to our Post-Office Department in sending our foreign mails to different parts of the world.

In addition to that, the minority of the Commission have called attention to the fact that this bill provides for ten new routes between the Pacific, Atlantic, and Gulf coasts of the United States and South America, Central America, Cuba, Africa, and the coast of Asia. I believe Australia is included already. There are ten new routes, in fact, proposed by this bill, which, with those already established—seven, I think, in number—ought to enable us to reach almost any port in the world by American mail lines, and there will be no possible excuse that I can see for the utilization of these slow-going tramp vessels.

Therefore, I put it down that this provision is one of those things intended rather to create an impression that something is to be done than to really accomplish anything. I wish it to be understood that I am not casting any reflection on the majority of the Commission. I think the majority of the Commission have done all they could do and have labored very hard to invent something that would be a burden to the shipowner, and if they have not been able to find it it is not their fault.

The third provides:

That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the deck force, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

That provision is simply this: One-sixth of the crew of one of these tramps shall be citizens of the United States. I take it, Mr. President, that the ordinary tramp, if we do build them under this bill, will not have a crew of more than 21 men. They have to be run economically, as the tramps of the European nations are run, and I take it not one of them would carry more than 23, or at the outside, 24 men. Of course, if she gets to be a large ship of four or five thousand tons, it will carry a much larger number, for they have crews sometimes of as many as 40 or 50 men, but the smaller craft, which are those that do the transportation of the world, are vessels of from 1,500 to 2,500 and 3,000 tons and do not carry crews in excess of from 21 to 24 men. Their deck crews generally consist of just men enough to handle the work around the deck, to attend to and take care of the steering, and relieve each other on watch.

There is also a provision here to which I take exception. It is that which declares what an able seaman shall be. It is proposed to provide here by legislation that an able seaman shall be a man who has been at sea two years—

At least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

There are two kinds of seamen. There are the able seamen and the ordinary seamen. The able seaman is the man who is fully equipped to do any work aboard ship. He can splice, he can sew a sail, he can do anything that he is called upon on board ship to do. He is an all-round capable man; whereas the ordinary seaman is not by any means up to his acquirements. The ability to classify oneself as an able seaman arises as much from experience as from anything else. Certainly we can not make him an able seaman by legislation.

Mr. President, I think there is really more harm in this provision than appears on the surface. The able seaman commands better wages. He is in the line of promotion. He may be made boatswain on a ship that carries boatswains; he may be made a mate, whereas an ordinary seaman is not in the line of promotion. I think it is a mistake for us to say——

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MALLORY. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask my friend from Florida if he does not think that provision is an improvement upon the present law? Anyone who has had two years' experience as a seaman at sea has learned to hand reef and steer, to splice ropes, to handle cables, and all that pertains to a ship and the rigging of a vessel. Anyone can ship as a landsman. The Senator himself is something of a sailor, and I in my earlier days had some experience. I have been shipmate with men who, though able seamen, could neither hand reef nor steer, who did not know the foremast from the mizzenmast, or the top-gallant yard from the spanker.

Mr. MALLORY. And they were generally made to regret that they did not before they got through with the voyage.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question of that; but the object of this bill is, as I understand it, to encourage men to go to sea, to make them seamen, that they may properly man the ship and thereby protect property and life.

Mr. MALLORY. The point I make is that we already know what an able seaman is. As the Senator has said, he is a man who can hand reef and splice. That is the general definition of him.

Mr. PERKINS. Hand reef and steer.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, he can hand reef, splice, and steer. He can do anything necessary about the ship, whereas the ordinary seaman can not. It is proposed to abolish the distinction between them and declare that a man who has been at sea two years, whether he is able to do these things or not, shall be classed as an able seaman. You might just as well say that a man who has been at school or to college two years shall be an LL. D.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, will he suggest a better definition? The Senator knows that he has been a party to the consideration of this bill. The majority felt that this requirement was a very great advance over the existing law. Now, if there is a better definition to be found, I am sure we would want to incorporate it in the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not think it is necessary to define an able seaman at all, any more than it is to define a master of arts or any other individual who enjoys some distinction among his fellows for what he can do.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend knows that one who has been running a prairie schooner out in the West can now ship as an able seaman. There is no prohibition in the law to prevent him from doing it. But if this bill is enacted into a law he must have had two years' nautical experience.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; I think it is possible for a man who has been running a prairie schooner to ship as an able seaman, but he would do it only once; he would regret that he did it. He would have to be very green, in my judgment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator simply for information, and as he knows, in entire good faith, if he thinks this bill would be improved by striking out that provision?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; that is my impression, after the word "seamen."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a suggestion which I think ought to be taken into consideration. If the bill is going to be improved by taking out that requirement, we will consider it, but for my part it seems to me that it is a very wise provision to require that a man shall have had two years' experience on deck. He certainly must be a very stupid man if he does not learn to perform the requirements of an able seaman during those two years.

Mr. MALLORY. I think that if, without saying anything about being an able seaman, the bill provided that he should have seen two years' service on deck it would suffice.

Mr. GALLINGER. The thought that was in the mind of some of us was that under existing law any man could ship claiming to be able seamen, whether he had had this service or not, and we require him to have had two years' experience. Of course, if he fails to come up to the requirements there is no law that would compel his retention in the service.

Mr. MALLORY. The first condition, Mr. President is:

That a vessel employed in the foreign trade shall maintain, during the period so employed, at least class A1 if a steam vessel and at least class A1½ if a sail vessel, as such classes are now established by either the Record of American and Foreign Shipping or the United States Standard Owners, Builders, and Underwriters' Association, or equivalent classification in any other register of shipping of at least equal merit.

I do not think that that is a very material requirement. A shipowner is going to see that his vessel is in a seaworthy and effective condition, and I hardly see any reason why this bill should be burdened with that requirement.

In passing, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire why it is that there is a distinction between a steam vessel in the classification A1 and a sailing vessel A1½? I confess I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will simply say to the Senator that it goes without saying he knows a good deal more about these technical matters in relation to shipping than I do. He and the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] are the authorities in the Senate, I think, on those questions.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask the Senator from California, then.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will first give an answer. I will say to the Senator that the Commissioner of Navigation was consulted about this matter, and other gentlemen who are very well versed in these questions. They gave it as their opinion that this was a proper distinction, and that that distinction ought to be placed in the bill. The Senator from California can very likely give a reason from the shipping standpoint that will be more conclusive than my suggestion.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Florida as to the first proposition that a shipowner will keep his ship in proper condition, and therefore without classification, that that may be true to a certain extent; but he can not insure her in any insurance company unless the ship has that rating; and in order to have the rating she must be dry docked so often, and a survey held upon the ship.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator misunderstands me. I do not question the necessity of her being rated, perhaps, so much as I do why the provision should be inserted here. They all have to be rated, of course.

Mr. PERKINS. Not having been a member of the Commission, I am unable to answer fully; but my impression is that there is a wide distinction between a steam vessel and a sailing vessel. The life of the boilers of a steam vessel is about eight years, and they have to be replaced by new boilers or repairs worked upon them that would amount in the aggregate to about 50 per cent of their value. A sailing vessel having no machinery or steam boilers, it is not required that they shall be replaced, but the requirement is simply to look after the fastenings of the ship, to see that her plates, keelsons, and frame are in proper condition. Therefore she has that classification. There is that difference in favor of the sailing vessel. No one understands better than my friend from Florida that the sailing vessel is propelled only by her sails, with no machinery. There is not the wear and tear or the strain upon a sailing vessel that there is upon a steamship. With her propeller, with her shaft, she is continually getting into trouble, and must be carefully looked after in order to maintain her classification in the bureau or the record book in which she is classed.

Mr. MALLORY. One would think from the reason assigned by the Senator from California that a sailing vessel would be classed A1 and a steamship A1½. I think there is much more reason for the steamship to deteriorate rapidly than the sailing vessel. However that may be, I appreciate the effort of the Senator from California, and I think there is undoubtedly truth in what he says.

The point I make on this paragraph is that there is no occasion to put it in here as a burden on the shipowner or a consideration for this benefit, because he will have to do it anyhow. If he wants to get cargo, he can not run his ship without being rated, whatever her rating may be, and he can not get insurance on his freight or on his hull and the owners of the cargo can get no insurance on the cargo unless the vessel is properly rated. Consequently I do not see that there is any consideration in requiring the shipowner to have the vessel rated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, if the Senator will permit me, is it not a fact that a great many vessels do go out without being classified, and are in service?

Mr. MALLORY. It used to be so in the English service, and in certain trades undoubtedly it is so to-day. It is the case in the timber trade particularly. They will take an old hulk that is possibly 30 or 40 or 50 years old and take in a cargo of timber because it will not sink. The practice which prevailed in England for years got so bad that the Plimsoll law had to be enacted by Parliament, which permits them to load only to a certain depth. But we have not found any necessity for that in this country. We have had no such experience as that that I know of or have heard of. In fact, I was discussing with some shipping people not long ago the advisability of establishing the Plimsoll mark, or something similar to the Plimsoll mark, for American ships. I found that there was no desire for it; that there was no demand for it in our foreign commerce, and I do not know that there is any in our coastwise commerce. Vessels would sometimes overload, undoubtedly, and in that way incur great risk; but the employment of a vessel the material of which is not well put together, that is weak structurally, that is liable to be wrecked because of improper construction, I think is extremely rare—so rare, in fact, that I have never heard of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, if the Senator will permit me, inasmuch as we are proposing to pay a subvention to these vessels, does the Senator see any harm in our requiring them to be seaworthy vessels?

Mr. MALLORY. No; I do not see any harm in it; but I do not see any special good in it. The only point I make on it is that it amounts to nothing one way or another. You put it in merely as a makeweight to convey the impression that the shipowner has got something to do in order to get this money that is going to be paid to him, when in reality it does not amount to a row of pins whether he does it or not. That is my idea.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that point I can assure the Senator to the contrary. There has been no effort made by either the majority of the Commission or the committee to deceive Congress in reference to this matter. The Commission was of the opinion that it was desirable to make this requirement of vessels that received the subvention from the Government; that they ought to be seaworthy vessels, and that they ought to come up to some standard requirement. I can not for the life of me see why that is not a wise provision.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, I do not object to it except in the light in which I have put it. And, Mr. President, I want to be distinctly understood as casting no reflection on the majority of the Commission, who I believe are sincere, and I am satisfied that the Senator from New Hampshire is sincere, in believing that this requirement is worth something. In my own judgment it is worth no more as a consideration than if we were to require the master to read prayers to the seamen every morning at 9 o'clock.

The fifth requirement is as follows:

That all ordinary repair or overhauling of said vessel shall be made in the United States, except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within a distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when the repairs shall be needed.

With reference to that, Mr. President, I will say that the ordinary repairs of our ships are necessarily made in this country. I speak of the ordinary repairs as distinguished from the extraordinary repairs. The ship comes over here to her home port to be discharged. She is painted, and it happens, perhaps, if she has been trading in southern waters, she has to be scraped, the barnacles and sea grass removed. She is then taken to a dry dock. That would probably under such circumstances be classed as ordinary repairs, and I hardly think it would be imposing any burden upon the shipowner to require him to do it. I think he would have his repairs done in this country anyhow.

As to the provision here of a dry dock of sufficient capacity within 500 miles, I confess the language of it is a little ambiguous. A shipmaster last evening called my attention to it, and the construction which he put upon it led me to think perhaps it would be well to call the attention of the chairman of the Commission to it. He seemed to think that that meant that the ship must be repaired at home under all circumstances, except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within the distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when repairs shall be needed. To my mind that means if the vessel happens to be in Europe when the repairs are needed she can go into a foreign dry dock and be repaired there. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if that is his understanding of it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly repeat the statement he made?

Mr. MALLORY. It is the fifth provision, providing that—

All ordinary repair or overhauling of said vessel shall be made in the United States, except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within a distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when the repairs shall be needed.

If there is any ambiguity about it, it ought to be corrected, if this bill is going to pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the Senator's further suggestion was what?

Mr. MALLORY. That a shipmaster, a man who is interested in shipping, was reading it to me last night, and the construction which he put upon it was that the location of the ship would be such that he would have to have the vessel repaired in the United States. I do not see any reason for it, if that is the provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is the "ordinary repair or overhauling of said vessel." The Senator, I think, made the suggestion that under the provisions of this section a shipmaster abroad could go into a foreign dock. Was that it?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; I think under this clause he can do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think if the vessel required overhauling it would be a very absurd thing to require him to cross the Atlantic or the Pacific to get to an American dock. I know of no reason why he should not go into a foreign dock under those circumstances.

Mr. MALLORY. That is my understanding of the meaning of this section. It is that ordinary repairs shall be done in this country, except in cases in which a vessel is not within 500 miles of an American dry dock. That is my understanding.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was the purpose of the Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be better to insert the word "American" before the words "dry dock?"

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. SPOONER. It certainly is not plain as it is now.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; I think that would be an improvement in the language.

Mr. GALLINGER. It occurred to me, and I meant to call attention to it. I think that is an omission in the bill. It should read "no American dry dock."

Mr. MALLORY. I think that would relieve it of all ambiguity.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the proper time I will move that amendment, if the Senator from Florida does not.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir. Now, the sixth provision, Mr. President, is the one relating to the naval reserve, and is intended, I think, as the pièce de resistance in this bill. This Commission was organized and authorized to prepare a bill for the purpose of rebuilding our depleted merchant marine, and after much labor they have come in with a bill which provides for a naval reserve with incidental building up of the merchant marine. The naval reserve feature is adopted as a possible justification of the subsidy feature of the second section. The proportion of men who are required by the sixth section to be employed aboard American ships engaged in the foreign trade or deep-sea fisheries is as follows:

After July 1, 1908, one-eighth; after July 1, 1912, one-sixth; after July 1, 1917, one-fourth: Provided, That if the foregoing stated proportions of naval reserves can not be obtained at a foreign port with reasonable effort, as certified by the consul, other persons may be substituted until the first return of said vessel to the United States, without forfeiture of the subvention.

Now, the point that I would like to make to the Senator from New Hampshire on that is, Why was it necessary to provide a naval reserve in this bill at all? We could have provided a naval reserve without any subsidy bill. We could have provided these payments to all sailors who ship aboard ship in the coastwise trade and in the foreign trade. There are at least 50,000 American seamen who could be utilized for that purpose. I say, 50,000; there are 135,000 American seamen, taking in the Lakes. What we want is a reserve of men capable of going aboard our men-of-war and doing the duty exacted of the sailors on men-of-war.

It is true that among the crew of an ordinary modern man-of-war there are few of the men who are absolutely necessary on board a merchant sailing ship. Almost all the men aboard a man-of-war are machinists, electricians, men who have some mechanical skill, and who are intelligent and able to handle the machinery of guns, the machinery of engines, and things of that kind; and we could train them just as well on board the steamships that ply on the Lakes as we could on the steamships that ply on the ocean for those purposes. Consequently, I do not see why it was necessary that the naval-reserve feature should be tacked on this bill except for the purpose of giving it weight.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator asks me why this has been done. I confess to profound astonishment. The Senator sat with us through two summers as a member of the Merchant Marine Commission and considered this bill as a member of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and this is the first time I have heard him object to it or raise the question.

Now, Mr. President, it is well known that the Navy Department has been extremely anxious to have a naval reserve. In the last Congress we had a bill before the Senate looking to that end. It was not enacted into a law. In giving consideration to this question it seemed to the Commission that we did not need ships any more than we needed men, and that it was extremely important, in view of the interests of the Navy Department, if these two provisions could be combined, to get not only a bill that would rehabilitate to some extent at least the merchant marine, but likewise give us sailors and a naval reserve.

I do not think there was any ulterior purpose in this. I have never heard it suggested before by anybody. I think it is a very wise provision, and that it does ask from the shipowner something in return for the favor he gets from the Government, if this bill shall become a law.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I did not make any objection to this provision while I was a member of the Commission nor since the bill was presented to the committee, but there is no reason why I did not have in my mind this very point that I am making now. I would not move to strike it out of this bill. If this bill is going to become a law I want it to stay in there, because I think it is a better method of building up a naval reserve than would be the method which I have suggested. But at the same time I do not think it is so essentially better that this bill to rehabilitate the merchant marine should be made subservient to that purpose. The bill is to build up the merchant marine, not to furnish the Government with a naval reserve.

Practically the only point that is made, in my judgment, by the majority of the committee on these conditions is contained in that sixth provision. There is something there. You require a vessel to carry men, which is not necessarily the case ordinarily. You could not require it of an ordinary vessel, but you do give the ship that carries the men an inducement to do it by giving the men more wages than they could possibly receive in the open market. You are paying the average sailor $3 a month more than the wages he would probably demand in the port at which he ships. Consequently I am inclined to regard it as an improvement to some extent upon the measure that would propose to furnish a naval reserve by simply paying the men a bounty for serving aboard a deep-sea fisherman or in the coastwise and foreign merchant marine service without such a bill as this.

But that does not preclude me, Mr. President, from calling attention to the fact that it is not necessary at all, that it is not essential here, that it is rather in here really—I do not mean to say that it was done with intent to deceive, but that it was put in here for the purpose of giving some color of a reason why this donation from the Treasury should be given to the individuals owning ships.

The argument I make is that you take these first, second, and third sections and boil them down and you can come to no other conclusion than that this donation or this subsidy of $5 a ton to the merchant ship or the merchant owner is a clear gift, without any consideration, from the Treasury to the individual, for the purpose of enabling him to carry on his private business.

If that is so, then, Mr. President, I do not believe that there is a majority in this body, or in any body of intelligent Americans, who will support such a measure. The effort has been made to carry a similar measure through here certainly on two occasions since I have been in this body. It is true it passed this body on one occasion, but it failed to go through a body elsewhere, and has never become a law.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Before the Senator leaves the sixth subdivision I should like to ask him whether outside of the proportion of reserves that shall constitute the crew of the vessel, first, one-eighth, one-sixth, and then one-fourth, the one-fourth being required after 1917, there is the right to constitute the crew of sailors of any other nation—that is, Norwegians, Italians——

Mr. MALLORY. The balance of the crew?

Mr. PATTERSON. I mean the balance of the crew.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. So the only members of the crew to whom higher wages are required to be paid than is paid for the crew of any foreign vessel would be this one-eighth, one-sixth, and one-fourth?

Mr. MALLORY. That is a fact. As it is to-day, you know, there is no restriction upon our employing a sailor of any nationality on board ship.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me ask the Senator what the provision is in reference to officers? Are they all necessarily citizens of the United States?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; the officers are citizens of the United States now by law.

Mr. PATTERSON. How about engineers?

Mr. MALLORY. The engineers and the watch officers, as they are called.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt that is an interesting colloquy and I should like to hear it, if the Senator from Colorado will turn in this direction.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was asking the Senator from Florida about the proportion of the crew of any vessel under this bill that must necessarily be American so far as the crew is concerned. First, one-eighth, then one-sixth, then one-fourth, are all that need be American citizens, and outside of that proportion they may go to any country to secure their sailors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely as they do now.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; but the term "all officers" includes Americans as engineers?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the law.

Mr. PATTERSON. And this applies simply to the crew?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, on this question of a bald donation out of the Treasury, I have on divers occasions in this body called attention of Senators to the utterances of some of our wisest and ablest men, and I do not think that I am misplacing their utterances by again incorporating them in my remarks on this subject.

Justice Cooley, in his work on Taxation, page 89, edition of 1876, speaking on this subject, says:

> However important it may be to the community that individual citizens should prosper in their industrial enterprises, it is not the business of government to aid them with its means. Enlightened states leave every man to depend for his success and prosperity in business on his own exertions, in the belief that by doing so his own industry will be more certainly enlisted, and his prosperity and happiness more likely to be secured. It may therefore be safely asserted that taxation for the purpose of raising money from the public to be given or even loaned to private parties, in order that they may use it in their individual business enterprises, is not recognized as a public use. In contemplation of law it would be taking the common property of the whole community and handing it over to private parties for their private gain, and consequently unlawful. Any incidental benefits to the public that might flow from it could not support it as legitimate taxation.

Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, in the course of the decision in the case of the Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wallace, page 655, said:

> The power to tax is, therefore, the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. * * * This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised. To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it on favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

Therefore, Mr. President, we have at least the authority of two very eminent Americans that if this bill proposes to do what I contend it does do—that is, to make a gratuitous donation to individuals for the purpose of carrying on their private business, with the idea that incidentally the public may be benefited, it is an invasion of the right of the citizen and is in violation of the fundamental principles of the system under which we live.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if it will not interfere with the line of his argument.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like the Senator to give the reasons for the decline of our merchant marine. I have seen it stated that in 1860 we carried 80 per cent of our commerce in American bottoms, and now it is only about 10 per cent. That is a most astonishing decline if true, and I should like the Senator right here to give me the reason why it has declined.

Mr. MALLORY. I am inclined to think, Mr. President, that it has declined on account of the policy of the Republican party in dealing with the subject of ship subsidy and the advancement of our merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want the Senator from Florida to answer the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MALLORY. I have the authority of the Senator from New Hampshire on that, and I propose to read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be very happy to have the Senator read it. It is good gospel.

Mr. MALLORY. I will do so if I can find it here in his report.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire said the Republican party had failed to extend protection to the sea as it had protected all our industries on land. That is the position the Senator from New Hampshire holds to-day.

Mr. MALLORY. I will read what the Senator from New Hampshire says. Anyhow, we can draw our conclusions from it:

OUR ONE UNPROTECTED INDUSTRY.

> Finally, there is need of American ships because the historic industry of ship owning and building for ocean trade has at least as good a right to national encouragement as any industry protected by the Government. From 1789 until shortly before our civil war American shipping in the foreign trade was in some form or degree protected, first by discriminating duties and tonnage taxes, and later by mail subventions. It is a matter of record that so long as it was protected it prospered. But, for some unconscionable reason, when the protective policy in general was strengthened and broadened by the political party which came into full power in 1861, adequate encouragement was denied to this one industry out of all our industries, and has been denied to the present time.
> The mere requirement that vessels of American register shall be American built, which is often loosely referred to as protection to shipping and as proof that our shipping has been "protected to death," is of itself no protection at all. If there were a tariff duty fixed so high as to prohibit American woolen manufacturers, for example, from purchasing foreign machinery, and if at the same time these woolen manufacturers, thus compelled to buy all their machinery at home or else go without, were absolutely denied so much as 1 per cent of protective duty on their finished product, it is not probable that woolen manufacturing would be described as a protected industry, or that many woolen mills would be built and operated under the flag of the United States.

That is the language, I believe, of the Senator from New Hampshire; and to my mind it is quite an indictment of the Republican party, which has practically been in control of the Government ever since the beginning of the decadence of the merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, there is another side to the question. The Senator's own party is somewhat responsible, as can clearly be shown. But I rose to ask the Senator a question on another point. The Senator says that this subvention is unconstitutional, and he reads from eminent authorities to show that it is unconstitutional. Now, I will ask the Senator what about the 200,000,000 acres of land that were given to the transcontinental railroads. Was that an unconstitutional gift?

Mr. MALLORY. I am inclined to think possibly it could not be entirely justified by the Constitution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what he thinks about the subsidy that we pay to the southern railroads for carrying the mails each year in our postal bills. Is it unconstitutional?

Mr. MALLORY. No; I do not think so. I vote for it every time.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator votes for it, no doubt. I ask the Senator what he thinks about the appropriation of half a million dollars to exterminate the boll weevil in the State of Texas. Is that unconstitutional?

Mr. MALLORY. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it not for private benefit?

Mr. MALLORY. I think it is for the public.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the money come from the taxpayers of the country? And is it not used in one State and for one interest?

Mr. MALLORY. I think it is for the public weal entirely. It is true it incidentally benefits the individuals who manage to get rid of the boll weevil. It is for the public weal that it is done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think it is for the public weal to have vessels of the United States to carry our goods to foreign markets and promote our foreign commerce?

Mr. MALLORY. The distinction between them is this: I would think taking money out of the Treasury and paying it to the farmer as compensation to him for the loss of his cotton by the boll weevil would be a similar case exactly to this of taking money out of the Treasury to give it to a shipowner as compensation to him for loss by reason of the sharp competition of foreign shipowners.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the money reach the farmer's pocket indirectly?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not mean to say but what it does.

Mr. GALLINGER. What difference does it make?

Mr. MALLORY. There are a great many indirect ways of accomplishing things—roundabout ways.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is an indirect way to give a subsidy constitutional and a direct way unconstitutional?

Mr. MALLORY. I think you can in a roundabout way accomplish some things that you can not do in a direct way—that is, you accomplish the result probably in a legitimate manner when you could not do it directly in a legitimate manner. But the Senator called my attention to the postal subsidy. I do not find any fault with the postal subsidy. I think that is one of the best features of this bill. The Senator knows that I acquiesced readily as a member of the Commission. The only fault I ever found with that is I do not think we give postal subsidy enough. I would vote readily to increase the subsidies that are provided for from the Gulf of Mexico, because I doubt very much whether you will establish the lines that are sought to be established to Brazil and Argentina on the small subsidy that is given. But the postal subsidy is a very different thing from a general subsidy or what is a plain, straightforward bounty. Postal subsidy is an extraordinary payment for an extraordinary service; and I think any man, no matter how strict he may be in his construction of the law and the Constitution, can reconcile himself to voting for a postal subsidy if it is a bona fide postal subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to observe on that point that I chanced to be in the chair when the Senator discussed one or two features of the bill a little time ago, in which he said that this subvention was not sufficient to induce shipowners to operate their vessels; and he read the testimony of some shipowner in Texas to that effect. Of course if that is so, then no money will go out of the Treasury for this purpose. If they do not avail themselves of it, it costs nothing.

Now, as to the matter of postal subvention or subsidy. I am not frightened at the word "subsidy," although we did use the word "subvention." It means the same thing. The Commission have had assurances from a great many shipowners in the country that if this postal subvention is granted and these lines established that are named in the bill they will build ships and operate them under that subvention.

Mr. MALLORY. I am aware of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, that is all I know about it.

Mr. MALLORY. I am aware of it; and I think the Commission acted wisely. Heretofore the matter has been left to the Postmaster-General to determine where the routes shall be. The Commission took testimony, examined into the necessities of the different sections of the country with regard to foreign mails, and established the routes themselves by this bill. I think they acted very wisely in doing it, and I am very glad it is incorporated in the bill, because if the bill is to be passed there will be at least one feature in it of which I can approve.

But, Mr. President, I called attention some time ago to the fact that this bill proposes to build cargo carriers, to provide for what are known as "ocean tramps" that seek cargo from port to port. It also provides for several lines of subsidized mail vessels to different ports. So far as the mail lines are concerned, I can see a vast benefit that may accrue to us from their establishment. I believe that the Australian line from San Francisco to Australia, which is a mail subsidized line, has increased the trade between the United States and Australia largely. I do not remember the percentage, but it is very large in the last few years. I believe that wherever we do establish an adequately provided mail line, with vessels plying regularly and with certainty, from a port of the United States to the port of destination and back, with regular sailing days and regular arrival days, you will see trade spring up, and we will have no further complaint of a want of communication with such countries.

But these poorly subsidized tramps that are sought to be provided for in this bill, in my judgment, will not be provided for, and I can not see under the sun how they can possibly get cargoes. They do not get enough subsidy to compete with a foreign vessel. Foreign vessels without the subsidy can beat them in the contest. Where they are to get their cargoes from, if you have them, is something I can not understand. You have to provide cargoes, Mr. President, for your ships or you will have no trade. It is one of the defects of any subsidy system that it does not make provision for the cargo.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Florida will permit me, I desire to ask him a question, in the hearing also of the Senator from New Hampshire. As I understand the provisions of the bill, there are no exceptions whatever, but all seagoing vessels engaged in foreign trade will be entitled to receive a subsidy from the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they choose to take it in preference to the postal subvention. They can not take both.

Mr. BACON. I understand they can not be paid for carrying the mails and at the same time be paid this subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is prohibited in terms by the bill.

Mr. BACON. The question to which I direct attention will not at all be affected by that suggestion, because it does not relate to that class of ships. We know generally that there are large enterprises in this country which transport their own products to foreign markets in vessels which are owned by the producers. I use the word "producers" in order to cover manufacturers, miners, or any other class of producers. These producers have their own lines of steamships to carry their own products to foreign countries.

If I am correct in my construction of the bill, any one of these large enterprises, with fleets of either steamers or sailing vessels engaged in the transportation of their own products, would be entitled to this subsidy. In other words, if a manufacturing enterprise had a steamer, say, of 2,000 or 3,000 tons, it would be entitled to receive out of the United States Treasury every year from ten thousand to fifteen thousand dollars, as the case might be, as an additional compensation, owing to the fact that the manufacturer carried his own goods to market. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course there must be very few such instances.

Mr. BACON. I do not know, Mr. President, whether there are very few or not.

Mr. MALLORY. The Standard Oil Company is one.

Mr. BACON. I had that in mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the second one?

Mr. FRYE. That is the only one there is.

Mr. MALLORY. The Great Northern Railroad.

Mr. BACON. The Standard Oil Company might be the only one, but we may very readily understand that it would be but a very short time before large enterprises, large producers, would see the very fine opportunities by which their business could be expanded in the construction of vessels to be engaged in the transportation of their own goods to foreign markets and receive very liberal additions to their income out of the United States Treasury when they are not really engaged in any public trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that this demonstrates the value of a debate such as we are having to-day. The Senator raises a point which is worthy of very serious consideration, and the difficulty suggested can be very easily cured in the bill, if it is thought desirable to do so.

Mr. BACON. I will not say any more about it, if the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of the bill considers the suggestion worthy of such consideration that it will evenuate in a change to cure that suggested evil. Until that has been determined, possibly it is not in order that I should say anything further on the subject.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator from Florida, before he leaves this subject-matter I should like to ask him a question. We all have the same end in view. If the bill is defective, as has been stated, each of us is desirous of perfecting it. The Senator from Florida emphasized the fact that this subvention to new vessels would go mostly to tramp steamers, to freight steamers, and that, therefore, there would be no burden imposed upon the shipowners for the transportation of the mails. I have in mind the fact that we have no direct communication between any port in the United States and Brazil and the Argentine Republic. If my friend from Florida should desire to send a communication to Rio or to Buenos Ayres, the letter would go via Liverpool or London.

Mr. MALLORY. We have no direct mail communication to South America.

Mr. PERKINS. No; but would this not encourage tramp steamers to open up our trade with Brazil and the Argentine Republic? We are now sending agricultural implements to those countries, which go via Liverpool and London and other European ports. If under this subvention they can receive a difference sufficient to overcome the increased cost of operating American vessels over that which it costs to operate foreign vessels, surely lines would be inaugurated and successfully operated between New York and Philadelphia and ports in South America. Then, instead of our farming implements, our nails, and the other hardware which we manufacture and which finds a ready market in South America being shipped in foreign vessels, they would be transported in vessels built by American mechanics, flying the Stars and Stripes, and going directly from New York and other Atlantic ports to South American ports. Those vessels would also carry the mails. What I wish to ask is, does not the Senator believe that this subvention would be a sufficient inducement to establish lines of American steamships?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir; I would say that it would not. In my judgment it would be necessary, if you should subsidize vessels—tramp vessels—enough to justify their going from here to Brazil, that they should be able to get an outward cargo, and the chances are that they would not get it——

Mr. PERKINS. We bring coffee from there.

Mr. MALLORY. I am speaking of our exports to Brazil. They would not amount to $11,000,000 all told, while our imports amount to $75,000,000. Consequently, it is a question whether we could get any outward cargo; but even if we could get an outward cargo, the subsidy, in my judgment, is totally inadequate to compensate for the difference between the expense of running our ships and the expense of running foreign ships. We are going to establish some regular lines, and I believe that great good will grow out of it.

I would be glad to eliminate everything from this bill except the postal subsidy provision, and pass it in that way to-morrow, being under the conviction that it would add a great deal more to our commerce than any other feature of the bill, because of the regularity, the certainty, with which those vessels would come and go

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MALLORY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Florida to section 6, and particularly to the eighth and eleventh subdivisions of that section. The section authorizes the Postmaster-General to establish certain ocean mail service, and subdivisions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 name, or apparently name, new routes for mail service. Then we come to paragraph 8, which reads:

> Eighth. From a port of the Atlantic coast of the United States to the United Kingdom and northern Europe, on steamships of the United States of not less than 20 knots speed, for a weekly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $250,000 a year in addition to the compensation now provided pursuant to contract under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

Then the eleventh paragraph reads:

> Eleventh. From a port of the Pacific coast of the United States via Hawaii and the Samoan Islands to Australasia, on steamships of the United States of not less than 16 knots speed, for a service once in three weeks at a maximum compensation of $217,000 a year in addition to the compensation now provided pursuant to contract under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

I want to ask the Senator from Florida, or any other Senator who may be able to give the information, whether this is not a direct provision to pay to steamship companies, already under contract at a stipulated sum for a number of years, $250,000 additional to the contract price, without the performance of any additional service for the Government for that additional compensation?

Mr. MALLORY. That is it, I believe. That is the effect of it.

Mr. PATTERSON. How can that be justified? Will the Senator from New Hampshire kindly answer the proposition?

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I will call his attention to the report of the minority of the Committee on Commerce——

Mr. PATTERSON. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. MALLORY. In that minority report the figures, so far as this additional aid to the American Line is concerned, are given, and I will state them.

The American Line, consisting of four ships, carried last year—this is an extract or compilation from this year's report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails—the American Line, with four ships, transported 171,000,581 grams of letters and 1,015,571,931 grams of printed matter, making a total of 1,186,572,512 grams of letters and printed matter, and received therefor a compensation of $662,688. They made 45 trips to Great Britain and 42 to France under their contract, which includes carrying the mail to France as well as to Great Britain, making a total of 87 trips.

Now, the foreign lines, that are carrying the mails on the North Atlantic—the North German Lloyd, the Hamburg-American, the Cunard, and the White Star—carried 371,304,972 grams of letters and 1,946,921,063 grams of printed matter, making a total of 2,318,226,035 grams of printed matter and letters, for which they received $548,152.18. They made 195 trips to Great Britain and 46 trips to France, making a total of 241 trips, against a total of 87 on the American Line.

The foreign lines carried 1,131,653,523 more grams of mail matter than the American Line, and received $114,535.82 less money for the service. The American Line, to which this additional pay of $250,000 is proposed to be given by this bill, has been running under the act of 1891 under a contract of ten years for ten years past, and more, they renewed their ten-year contract only in last October; and after this showing, that they carried but little more than one-half of the mail matter which these foreign vessels carried and received considerably more compensation for doing it, we propose to give them as a donation $250,000. That is the fact. There may be some explanation of it which I have not been able to ascertain.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MALLORY. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. This criticism is not unexpected. There is an explanation. We will take, for instance, the line on the Pacific coast via Hawaii and the Samoan Islands to Australasia, the great American steamship line operated by the Oceanic Steamship Company. That line is losing between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year, according to the testimony of men who must be believed. The company is seriously thinking of abandoning that line. I have noticed in the newspapers that that little nation called Japan has made a suggestion that they have a great steamship company there under very heavy subsidies from the Japanese Government that would like to take that line. That may be the ultimate result. Those who are at the head of the Oceanic Steamship Company say that unless they get some adequate help from the Government, which they do not get through the present postal-subvention law, that steamship company will, beyond a doubt, in the near future be abandoned.

The exports to Australasia have been increased enormously through the instrumentality of that American steamship line. Some of us thought that it was not wise to take any chances about this matter and that if we could save this line as an American line at this period, when our American merchant marine has been almost wiped from the seas, we ought to be willing to increase the subvention to about the point which was proposed in the postal-aid law of 1891 as it passed this body, but which was reduced in another. That is the reason we give for that.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire what particular line he has in mind in the eighth subdivision?

Mr. GALLINGER. That I am coming to presently.

Mr. PATTERSON. And also the particular line he has in mind in the eleventh subdivision?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Oceanic Steamship Company's line in the eleventh, and the so-called "American Line" in the eighth subdivision.

Now, Mr. President, as to the American Line, the only line we are running across the North Atlantic; they have four great steamships, and though they are owned by a company which has a large number of foreign steamships, they have continued to fly the American flag over those four great steamships. But that company has not paid any dividends and has been very seriously considering the question, notwithstanding it has taken this contract, whether after a little it will not have to surrender it.

There is an added reason why the Commission, or the majority of the Commission at least, thought it was wise to give a little help to this line, and that is the fact that the British Government very recently has advanced money to build two additional great steamships for the Cunard Line, advancing the entire amount at 2¾ per cent interest. Then they give to those two steamships a subvention or subsidy or $1,100,000 a year for twenty years, and they are going to take the pay for the steamships out of the subsidy that they are giving to these ships. Under these conditions I do not believe that any American line on the North Atlantic can exist with the compensation that is given by the postal-aid law of 1891.

It is true they have renewed their contract. They either had to do that or hoist the British or French or German flag. I am glad that they have been patriotic enough to take the chances for a few years more; but the best information that we have received is that they have never paid dividends and that under existing conditions they can not possibly pay dividends.

Those are two reasons which those of us who placed this amendment in the bill give for our action. We may not have acted wisely, but I have frankly stated the matter to the Senate, and I have no doubt that my friends on the other side of the Chamber will give to the suggestion whatever weight it is entitled to.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MALLORY. I will yield to the Senator if he wishes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then, Mr. President, this matter of a half million dollars, plainly stated, is this: Two steamship lines have existed for a number of years, one sailing from Atlantic ports and the other sailing from Pacific ports. They have had a contract with the Government, I think, perhaps, for a period of ten years for carrying the mails. Those contracts expired within the past year, and they remade those contracts with the United States for a period of ten additional years. Presumably they were anxious to get the contracts. They sought the contracts. They voluntarily entered into the contracts with the Government. Now, they come before Congress and state that their business is not such that they can continue to sail their ships under the American flag unless Congress will vote to them, for the identical service they have contracted to perform, the sum of half a million dollars in addition to the contract price; and, upon the representation of these steamship companies that they will go out of business, in the face of their contract, with contractual obligations existing, it is proposed to give them a half million dollars in addition to the contract price for the identical service they are obligated to perform under the contract.

If that precedent is established, Mr. President, I am inclined to think that there will be many people coming to Congress who have what they believe, or will pretend, are bad or nonpaying contracts, and insist that the Government shall voluntarily vote large additional contributions in order that they may be able to fulfill their obligations.

Mr. MALLORY. So far, Mr. President, as this North Atlantic line is concerned, I confess I do not see any possible excuse for this additional donation of $250,000, and if I am here when this bill comes up for action I shall move to strike out that provision and will offer an amendment to that effect, because it strikes me as being bad business, and not only bad business, but that it is done without any adequate reason being assigned.

The fact is alleged by the majority of the Commission that these so-called "American vessels"—they are under the American flag, but the company that owns them has many more vessels under foreign flags than it has under the American flag—have to do their work in the boisterous season of the year, as well as in the calmer stages of the year. That is rather a hardship, but they have recently renewed the contract after a ten years' experience, complaining, it is true, I believe, that they are not making any money out of it; but they have chosen to renew the contract, and here within two months after the renewal of that contract they appear by their representatives before our commission and ask for $250,000 additional, and it is proposed to be given to them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him just at that point?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is true that these contracts have been renewed.

Mr. MALLORY. I am not attacking the Australasian company. I assented to the increase for that company.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but the American Line——

Mr. MALLORY. I assented to the increase of compensation to the Australasian line because I believed that it was meritorious on the evidence that was brought out, but the increase to the other company strikes me as straining the limit of endurance.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I wanted more particularly to emphasize—perhaps I am wrong in my supposition on that point, and I should like to ask the Senator's opinion—is the position of the American Line that is running from New York four great steamships, the St. Paul, the St. Louis, the New York, and the Philadelphia. It is true they have renewed their contract. Their representations are that they are not making any money. Supposing those four steamships go under a foreign flag, is there any obstacle, legal or constitutional, in the way of the foreign government or the foreign country obligating itself to fulfill the contract that the American Steamship Line has given bonds to perform, and hence wiping out the American Line?

Mr. MALLORY. I have never seen one of the contracts. I do not know whether it is required that that service shall be done by vessels under the American flag. I am inclined to think the contracts do require that the service shall be performed by American vessels.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that is so, my point is not well taken.

Mr. MALLORY. I have never seen the contracts.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had the impression that such was not the case; that the companies simply bonded themselves to perform these services. That was my impression. I may be wrong.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MALLORY. I yield.

Mr. FRYE. I remember perfectly well that it was brought out in a former investigation of this matter that if, of the four ships in the American Line, two had remained under the British flag and the two new ones constructed here had been put under the British flag, this American Line would have received every year $127,000 more for the service than they receive now as an American line under the postal contract.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know how that is. I have heretofore heard the Senator say that.

Mr. FRYE. That I found to be true at the time I stated it, at any rate.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know how the Senator can make it out with these figures. Here we have four foreign lines, each line having a number of vessels, and they made 241 trips.

Mr. FRYE. I heard the Senator's figures when he gave them.

Mr. MALLORY. They made 241 trips in that year. They carried nearly twice as much mail matter as the other line, and yet their whole compensation was $114,535 less than the four ships in the American Line. If what the Senator says is correct, I do not see how his figures could possibly be reached, and yet they are taken from the report of the superintendent of foreign mails.

Mr. FRYE. But under the British law they receive a good many other payments of money besides the postal subsidy.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, if the Senator means that the foreign steamers are getting pay from the other countries——

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MALLORY. Then, of course, I will admit that. I do not know how much that is.

Mr. FRYE. I found it to be $127,000 a year, I remember.

Mr. MALLORY. Possibly that is so.

Mr. FRYE. They would have been better off under a foreign flag than under ours.

Mr. MALLORY. I was under the impression that the Senator was alluding to the pay they were getting from the United States Government.

Mr. President, the hour is getting late——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MALLORY. I yield.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator concludes I should like to make an inquiry, to be answered either by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] or the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], as may be most convenient for them. I do not profess to be familiar with this subject, and desire to have some information. If I understand correctly, the act of March 3, 1891, providing compensation for steamships engaged in carrying the mails on routes to be designated by the Postmaster-General, is still in force.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is still in force.

Mr. BACON. That act is in force. It is without limitation, if I understand it correctly, as to any foreign port, except as to the Dominion of Canada. In other words, as the law now stands the Postmaster-General is authorized to make contracts with any ship for the purpose of carrying the mails between the United States and any foreign port he may think of sufficient importance to put under the terms of this act, and receive therefor the compensation provided by section 5 of that act:

SEC. 5. That the rate of compensation to be paid for such ocean mail service of the said first-class ships shall not exceed the sum of $4 a mile, and for the second-class ships $2 a mile, by the shortest practicable route, for each outward voyage; for the third-class ships shall not exceed $1 a mile, and for the fourth-class ships two-thirds of $1 a mile for the actual number of miles required by the Post-Office Department to be traveled on each outward-bound voyage: Provided, That in the case of failure from any cause to perform, etc.—

That is the general provision of law now; that is, between the United States and any foreign port, except ports in the Dominion of Canada, the Postmaster-General is authorized to make a contract with steamship companies by which they will receive the compensation which I have just read. Am I correct in that view?

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Now, as I understand, the fifth section of the pending bill proposes to give the Postmaster-General practically the same authority. In what particular does the fifth section confer any authority upon the Postmaster-General, and in what particular does it give the opportunity for the opening of new routes which is not now given by the act of 1891?

Mr. GALLINGER. The only difference is——

Mr. BACON. I understand, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, that ships which would receive compensation under the fifth section of the pending bill would not receive the compensation provided by other sections of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. BACON. And that they would receive only the compensation which is specified in the act of 1891?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no inhibition against any steamship company now accepting the terms of the postal-aid act of 1891, but it has been demonstrated by an experience of fourteen or fifteen years that that compensation is not sufficient to induce the investment of capital in new steamship lines. What is proposed by this bill is to establish certain specified lines, giving a specific compensation to those lines, which is somewhat in excess of the amount in the postal-aid law of 1891.

Mr. BACON. That is not done by section 5.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; not by section 5.

Mr. MALLORY. Section 5 relates to section 6.

Mr. BACON. Section 6 fixes the routes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

Mr. BACON. Section 6 fixes the routes, but does not in any manner change the compensation.

Mr. MALLORY. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a repealing clause, I will say to the Senator, which gets rid of the compensation fixed in the law of 1891 so far as these lines are concerned. The Senator will find it toward the close of the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that in section 6 these routes are classified and compensation for each route is fixed in the section.

Mr. BACON. I see that, and it does to that extent vary the present law.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I desire to propound another inquiry.

The act of 1891 contemplates compensation according to the number of miles traveled. The present bill contemplates compensation by the time engaged in the service. In other words, under the act of 1891 they were paid so much per mile.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is under the act of 1891. Those are mail steamship lines. The provision regarding time is for cargo carriage.

Mr. BACON. But the point I am coming to is this—of course I should like to have a reason, and I presume it exists—why in the present bill the authors of it and those who support it think that the compensation by the time occupied in the service is preferable to the giving of compensation upon the basis of the number of miles traveled?

But before that I wish to make this suggestion for the information of Senators, if possible. I presume, without being a nautical man, it is true and well known that the cheapest service is the slowest service. In other words, a vessel which runs slowly does it at less expense than one which runs rapidly.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BACON. It is certainly true as to steamship lines, and I presume it is also in a modified degree true as to sailing vessels.

Now, I want to know upon what theory the bill proposes that a line of vessels which is run cheaply because it runs slowly and therefore does that much less work and is of that much less benefit to the commercial business of the world and of this country—why a vessel that is thus inferior in its accomplishments shall be considered entitled to the same compensation as one which runs rapidly and accomplishes more work? I should like to have the Senator from New Hampshire, if the Senator from Florida will pardon me, give the explanation of that which seems to me to be rather an unfavorable feature of this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension. Perhaps the Senator from Florida will make reply. If not, I will attempt to do so.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not think the Senator from Georgia has stated the fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; he has not.

Mr. BACON. I stated that I was not familiar with it, and for that reason I asked the Senator if I was correct in my statement, and I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say I was.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not mean to say that.

Mr. BACON. If the report gives a conclusion not be relied upon——

Mr. GALLINGER. What I meant to say is conveyed in my concluding sentence—that the Senator was laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. BACON. I shall be glad to be corrected, then.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not think there is anything in the bill to indicate that a vessel which is slow shall receive as much compensation as a vessel which is fast. The tendency has been in the postal subsidies to cut down speed in all instances, because heretofore we have really not had any criterion to go by by which we could determine the relative value of speed in the postal subsidies. But there is no question about it that we can not have any 20-knot vessels now on any route except, perhaps, the North Atlantic route. I do not believe we ever will build any 20-knot——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment, in order that I may ask him to explain that which I do not understand? Section 2 provides:

> That in the interest of the national defense and for the performance of the public services hereinafter specified, after July 1, 1907, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, subject to the provisions of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the owner or owners of any vessel hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States (including as such citizens any corporation created under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof), subventions as hereinafter provided; that is to say, (a) the sum of $5 per gross registered ton for each vessel which has been engaged in the foreign trade by sea or the deep-sea fisheries for a period of twelve months, including time necessarily consumed in receiving or discharging cargo, or not to exceed two months in making annual or extraordinary repairs; (b) the sum of $4 per gross registered ton for each vessel which, during any twelve consecutive months, etc.

In other words, if I were correct in the statement upon which I predicated the conclusion, I do not understand that language. It seems to me that that language provides for the payment to a vessel, which shall be engaged for twelve months, of $5 per ton. If that is not being paid by the time, regardless whether or not it is a slow vessel or a fast vessel, then I do not understand the plain English language.

Mr. MALLORY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was under the impression he was alluding to the postal subsidy.

Mr. BACON. No; I am not; I am alluding to this provision of the bill, and outside of the specific provisions which are made under the sixth section for the payment of postal subsidies, all of this money will be expended for the class of vessels which have no regular routes, which generally, as stated already by the Senator from Florida, go under the denomination of "tramps," and most of them are, I presume, slow vessels. I wanted one of the Senators, if possible, whichever one of them considers himself as most directly committed to the correctness of this provision, to explain how it is.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the Senator does not think that I indorse this provision?

Mr. BACON. I do not.

Mr. MALLORY. I have been talking in vain all day if he thinks so.

Mr. BACON. I do not think so, and it is for the reason——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not quite grasp what the Senator from Georgia has in mind. If the Senator is of opinion that we ought to have fixed a different rate for each vessel of different speed, we would have had a bill as large as the Revised Statutes which the Senator now has before him. All these vessels are of a slow type. They are cargo-carrying vessels.

Mr. BACON. But, if the Senator will pardon me, I can see no reason why in this case the question of mileage should not control. That need not involve the question of speed. I do not see why the question of mileage should not control rather than time consumed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That, of course, is a matter which is perhaps worthy of some consideration; but some of these vessels will doubtless run irregularly. They will take a cargo; they will go to one port, and there discharge a part of it and then go to another; and again they will run to some other port in the hope of getting some cargo. They will make triangular and quadrangular voyages.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly one of the things that I object to in this bill. It seems to me that if there is any one definite purpose which ought to be kept in view in a subsidy bill—if the Senator from Florida will pardon me for interfering with him in the course of his remarks—it ought to be a scheme by which trade is to be developed between this country and other specific countries, where we are assumed to need this particular encouragement.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what we are trying to do in this bill.

Mr. BACON. But, if I understand this bill, it does not do it. If every ship that would seek to get the advantages of this bill should confine itself to the trade between the United States and England, Germany, and France, where we now have the principal trade, the money would be paid out of the Treasury in the same way as if it were used in the encouragement of ships running to South America, where we desire to foster our trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. We propose to establish nine or ten specific lines that run to South and Central America, Africa, etc., for the purpose of developing trade.

Mr. BACON. That is under a different provision altogether.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. BACON. That is mail subsidy. I am speaking of the second section.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the very nature of things it would be impossible to provide that a cargo carrier should run to any given port; that it should traverse any specified route.

Mr. BACON. I think there is great difficulty in it, and I think it is one of the great inherent defects in the scheme.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the best we could work out.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Georgia has put his finger on what I think is one of the weakest spots of the bill. It is only necessary to read the report of the majority of the Commission to see that the majority themselves recognize the force of the objection to which the Senator from Georgia has just referred, because all the argument which the report contains is based upon the regularity of the communication which is to be established between this country and foreign countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true of mail lines, but I think the Senator himself ought not to try to commit a majority of the Commission to the idea that in this matter of the cargo carriers that principle ought to prevail.

[At this point a motion that when the Senate should adjourn it would be to meet on Monday next intervened.]

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, the point made by the Senator from Georgia a few moments ago, to which I was adverting—namely, that this bill does not in its general subsidy provide for the establishment of regular lines—is a point which is, I think, a strong and a valid one. As I said at the outset of my remarks, you could hardly expect a tramp vessel to develop any commerce unless you put her in a position in which she could get a cargo, and unless you give her subsidy enough to enable her to compete with foreign vessels she is not going to get cargo. Then, if it is a fact that there is not subsidy enough in this bill to justify a tramp vessel in undertaking to run in competition with foreign tramps, the only hope you have arises from the postal subsidy lines created by the bill. It strikes me that the Senator from New Hampshire had that in his mind when he prepared this majority report, because in several instances he refers generally to the regularity and efficiency of the lines which would be established by this bill, without apparently referring to the postal subsidy at all. I refer to the suggestion on page 4 of the report:

> National subventions to American shipping will, of course, encourage shipowners and shipbuilders of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Louisiana, California, and Washington; but these ships, built and run regularly and efficiently for the carrying of American mails and commerce, etc.—

Covering both the cargo carrier and the mail carrier. It was evidently contemplated by the Senator from New Hampshire that they will develop the commerce of the country.

Again, on page 17 of his report, the Senator speaks of the establishment by Germany of the North German Lloyd, her main steamship line to China, Japan, and Australia, as being a subsidy line:

> This is no conjecture; it is based on the hard facts of actual experience. Twenty years ago Germany's trade with the Far East was almost nothing. Bismarck urged, and the Reichstag granted, a subvention of 4,400,000 marks a year to the North German Lloyd for a new steamship line to China, Japan, and Australia.

That was simply a postal subsidy. Germany does not establish any lines by general subventions. She gives no general subventions, unless she has done it in the last year. That is just such a line as we propose to establish with Central America, South America, and Cuba by this bill—postal subsidy—and it produces the results which are referred to in this report, and which are very great, undoubtedly, and such, I have no doubt, as our postal subsidy lines will develop if they are ever put in operation.

But, Mr. President, I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate in much more discussion.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Before the Senator from Florida concludes, I wish to have a matter which gives me a little trouble explained, and I suppose it can be quite satisfactorily explained. The bill provides for subventions and also compensation. It provides for $5 per gross registered ton for vessels engaged in the foreign trade and the fisheries per year. It then provides that such a vessel receiving a subvention under this section shall not receive any other subvention, subsidy, or bounty from the Treasury of the United States, etc. Then, turning over to the sections that provide for the establishment of new postal routes, the language of the bill is that certain compensation shall be paid for carrying the mail upon those postal routes.

Is compensation for carrying mail either subvention, subsidy, or bounty? If it is not, then will not these mail steamship lines, those to be created and those already established, which are to be given additional compensation, receive this subvention in addition to the compensation for carrying mails?

Mr. MALLORY. I think not, Mr. President. I do not see any reason why there should be any such construction put upon it. It is clearly prohibited in both instances. Mail vessels are not to receive any other subvention than the mail subvention, and the vessels that receive the direct subsidy, or general subvention, as it is called, are to receive no other benefit.

Mr. PATTERSON. The provision is in section 2 that they shall receive no other subvention, subsidy, or bounty as compensation under the contract for carrying the mails.

Mr. MALLORY. It is all in this bill treated as mail subvention, whatever that may mean.

Mr. PATTERSON. Would it not make it much clearer if the word "compensation" was used?

Mr. MALLORY. It would probably make it much clearer, but I do not think there is any danger of anybody getting mixed on it, because you will observe that the word "subvention" is used all the way through in the bill. They have discarded the word "subsidy." It got into bad odor in this country, and they laid it aside and have taken up the word "subvention" instead.

Mr. President, I do not intend to consume any more of the time of the Senate in this desultory talk, but before leaving the subject I think it is proper I should express my views, or at least give some intimation of what I would do were I to be permitted to frame a bill for the purpose of rebuilding our merchant marine.

I am free to say that I have given the subject some thought, and I am very much inclined to favor the scheme that was generally outlined by the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] about eighteen months ago in this body, a bill for the promotion of our merchant marine by a system of discriminating duties. I, however, do not think that a system of indirect discrimination will avail. I am decidedly in favor of direct discrimination, and I think that the opportunity is presented to the country to-day to avail itself of its tariff to build up the grandest merchant marine the world has ever seen, and to do it at a comparatively slight cost.

It is true that we have the bugaboo presented to us, whenever the question is broached, that we have a number of treaties which constrain us and which would become ineffective upon our taking this action. All those treaties are in a certain sense mercantile conventions, not in the broad sense treaties. They contemplated, when they were originally instituted, that they could be set aside on a year's notice, and many of them have been set aside from time to time by other nations. I do not remember now exactly how many there are, but when I last figured it out I think there were only twenty-three of those so-called treaties which stood in the way. Many of them are simply clauses in treaties, providing that reciprocity in our intercourse with each other in shipping matters shall be observed for a certain period of time, at the expiration of which time the agreement can be set aside after a year's notice, or will be set aside with no action unless the other side should take some affirmative action in the matter.

Now, to hurry on, Mr. President, the treaty trouble has had no terrors for me. It has had for the Commission. There seems to be a notion, not merely confined to the Commission, but among a great many people in this country, that if we should undertake to set aside those treaties we might meet with very bitter retaliation, the results of which no man could predict.

Mr. President, we have given the nations of the world all the excuse in the world to retaliate on us. We have the highest protective tariff in the world. We have shut out everything by a wall that prevents foreign nations from sending their goods to this country, and we have no good will at all among the nations. Whenever they can retaliate on us they are going to do it, and we must not be restrained by the idea that if we do something particularly offensive they are going to retaliate. They will retaliate on us whenever they can do so effectively and put themselves in a better position than they now occupy.

I have not time to dilate on that point, but I believe it can be demonstrated that we have no real reason to apprehend any calamity to this country, any injury to our trade or commerce, by reason of the abrogation of every one of the treaties now in existence on the subject of reciprocity in shipping.

I have taken the trouble to figure out a little here as to what would be the result in the event Congress agreed to abolish these treaties and to establish a direct discrimination as between us and the nations of the world in the goods carried by American ships and the goods brought to this country by foreign ships.

We are told also, with a considerable air of menace, that the countries of the world that we wish to build up trade with, the South American countries particularly, with which we have a very limited trade, when in fact we should have a large trade, are countries whose products come to this country largely on the free list, and in order to avail ourselves of a discriminating duty there we would have to put those articles on the dutiable list.

I have sufficient confidence, Mr. President, in the people of the United States to have no hesitation whatever in believing that they would sustain me in voting to put many of those articles which are now on the free list on the dutiable list if the object to be accomplished is the building up of the merchant marine. It is a patriotic object. It is one which every man who has the welfare and good name and honor and glory of his country at heart will approve; and I have no hesitation at all in committing myself to the principle that if it is necessary, or if it will result in building up the merchant marine for the United States, it is my duty to put on the dutiable list such articles now on the free list as will be necessary to effect that purpose.

Now, I take the item of coffee from Brazil. We import all that coffee free. The importations amount to 445,489 long tons. At one-tenth cent per pound that would amount to $997,896, which would give the shipmasters an opportunity to get a cargo in Rio Janeiro or in all the ports of Brazil at a rate of $2,240 per 1,000 tons less freight than a foreign competitor. In other words, an American ship with one-tenth cent per pound on coffee would have an advantage over the foreigner on a cargo from Rio Janeiro to the United States of $2,240 per 1,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that the Senator means then to impose a duty on coffee in that case?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; one-tenth of a cent. I would be willing to vote for it if by so doing I could effectually contribute to building up the merchant marine.

With sugar it is the same. On sugar we pay a duty. We have an average duty on sugar of 1.5 cents per pound, a pretty heavy duty. We import 1,763,338 long tons. At a reduction of one-tenth of a cent we would have a reduction of $3,949,878, which would allow the same difference exactly at one-tenth of a cent on the 1,000 tons that there is in the case of coffee. That is, an American vessel would be $2,240 better off with a cargo of a thousand tons than a foreign vessel, so far as the ports of the United States are concerned.

Now, take India rubber and gutta-percha unmanufactured. We have 42,238 long tons, valued at $42,214,135. The duty at 2 cents a pound would amount to $1,892,277, which would be divided among American shipowners.

Hides.—A large proportion of the hides that come to this country from South America, 188,564,013 pounds, come in free; 83,652,950 pounds come in under 15 per cent duty. The duty on the dutiable hides is $1,621,827. Two per cent duty on the hides now free would be $820,571, a reduction of one-third, or 5 per cent duty on the dutiable, $540,609, making a saving to the American of $1,361,180 on 121,704 long tons.

Now, there are four items—two of them are dutiable and two of them are free. The total tonnage of those articles would be 2,372,769, and the total difference between the established and the discriminating duties would be $8,201,231. I merely cite those as an illustration to show how a direct discriminating duty would work. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that, under a wise system of tonnage taxes, we would have no difficulty whatever in providing a return cargo. We would have a cargo from Argentina, Brazil, or Central America; and when it gets to the port of the United States for which it is destined the duty imposed on tonnage, which has in the past been imposed, would act as a check on foreign competition for outward cargoes. The American merchant marine under such a stimulus would increase and flourish as it did when it led the world, and I doubt very much if more than ten years would elapse before we would have our merchant marine again in the gratifying position it occupied in 1860.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

During the delivery of Mr. MALLORY'S speech,

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. At this time I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he expects to continue the debate on the pending bill to-morrow?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Florida what his wish is on that matter.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not catch what the Senator from Iowa said.

Mr. ALLISON. I have been told that there are two or three very important committees that desire to have long sessions to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY. I expect to wind up my remarks to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that if the Senator from Florida concludes this evening I have no knowledge of any other Senator who desires to continue the debate immediately. There may be some Senator who has not suggested it, but I think I am safe in saying that probably no other Senator is prepared to continue the discussion to-morrow. If any Senator is prepared I wish he would indicate it.

Mr. ALLISON. If there is no pressure for a session to-morrow I would ask——

Mr. MALLORY. I will state that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] to-day gave notice that he intended to address the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator from Iowa desires to have an adjournment until Monday——

Mr. ALLISON. I will not make the motion if it will interfere with any Senator.

Mr. CLAY. It will suit me to speak on Monday just as well.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make a suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. There are a number of very important committees——

Mr. MALLORY. I think I will go on and finish my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator from Iowa propose to move an adjournment over?

Mr. ALLISON. I will not press what I intended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator from Iowa wishes to make the motion now, I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the notice given by the junior Senator from Georgia, I will not make the motion.

Mr. CLAY. I will state——

Mr. FORAKER. I will make it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I shall be glad to have the Senator make it if he thinks it ought to be made.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it ought to be made. We have to-morrow a meeting of our committee about railway-rate legislation, and it is impossible for us to make any satisfactory progress in an hour's meeting of the committee. If we could meet and stay there two or three hours, we might get something done. I think it is more important that the committees should have a chance once in a while than that we should stay here in session all the while. If the Senator from Georgia wants to speak to-morrow——

Mr. CLAY. It will be equally convenient for me to speak on Monday. I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall adjourn from to-day until Monday, and on Monday, after the morning business is finished, I shall call up my resolution for the purpose of submitting a few remarks.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of what the Senator from Ohio has so well said, that it is of the utmost importance that the Committee on Interstate Commerce should have time to consider the rate bill, I think we ought to adjourn over to-morrow, because, for one, I am very anxious that that question shall at some reasonable time not very far distant be placed before the Senate. Therefore I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I know this is not a debatable motion, but I wish to ask unanimous consent to make a single observation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I appreciate perhaps the necessity for adjourning over until Monday, and yet I regret exceedingly losing two days in the consideration of the unfinished business. This is an important matter.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the Senator does not think that this has been a day lost.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; not to-day, but Friday and Saturday. The Senator misunderstood me. I spoke of the loss of two days, which are Friday and Saturday. This measure has been before the Senate for five weeks now; in fact, it has been before the Senate for five years and more; and I do hope that at some reasonable time in the future we can get a vote on the bill.

I simply rose for the purpose of saying, Mr. President, that on Monday next I shall ask the Senate to agree to a time when a vote can be taken on the bill. I do not care whether it is three weeks, four weeks, five weeks, or six weeks from this time.

Mr. TELLER. I would suggest to the Senator that it is hardly fair to take up that question before the Senator from Florida gets through.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not doing so. I am merely suggesting that on Monday next——

Mr. TELLER. Or on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am speaking by unanimous consent, and I think I can make a suggestion. I am not aware of any rule that inhibits me from doing so.

Mr. TELLER. No; but I think the Senator is mistaken when he says a motion to adjourn to a day certain is debatable. I think it is not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that, and I obtained unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire asked for unanimous consent and got it.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I did say was that on Monday next I would good naturedly ask the Senate, and I will appeal to the Senator from Colorado if necessary, in person, to permit a vote on this bill at some time in the future within reason.

Mr. TELLER. I will suggest that about the 1st of June would suit me.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so, I will suggest to the Senator from Colorado that there will be some reprisals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

After the conclusion of Mr. MALLORY'S speech,

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 22, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for that sentiment deep down in the heart which at the opportune moment lifts men above the material and makes them heroes; which has symbolized the Cross of Calvary and made it the emblem of love, truth, righteousness, faith, hope, mercy, and peace; which has symbolized the flag of our country and made it the emblem of civil, political, and religious liberty; which is moving the hearts of our people to-day in a protest against the ruthless destruction of the good old ship Constitution. God grant that the appeal may be heeded, that the gallant old ship, with its thrilling story, may be preserved as an object lesson to future generations. In the name of Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that the prayer of the eloquent Chaplain be printed in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. SULZER. Then, Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that the prayer will be printed in the RECORD to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Speaker to prophesy whether there will be any to-morrow or not, but it does not require special action of the House to print the prayer in the RECORD.

Mr. SULZER. I move, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recognized for that purpose. In fact, the Chair will say to the gentleman that the prayer of the Chaplain is very frequently printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SULZER. Then I ask and I trust the prayer will be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. "Lest we forget." [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. We must not forget the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present, in the open House, the petition for the preservation of the frigate Constitution, and that that petition be read by the Clerk.

If I may be pardoned a very few words in explanation of my reason for asking that we deviate from our ordinary practice——

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be permitted to say what he desires to say. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, after the prayer of the Chaplain, I doubt if it is necessary for "the gentleman" to say anything; but I feel impelled to take this course in view of the notable object of the petition and the character of the signers.

The petition asks for the preservation of the most glorious ship that ever floated the American flag—I think I may say the most historic war ship that ever sailed the ocean.

The Secretary of the Navy in his report to Congress made certain suggestions, and he based them upon the statement that only a small portion of the material in the structure of the present ship was a part of the vessel one hundred years ago. This is doubtless true, but the fact that the Secretary considered if material is, to my mind, proof that he is lacking in historical imagination. The imaginations of the people have endowed this ship with a personality and a life, and, as in the case of men and all other living things, her physical body has changed. Our affection has gone out, not to mere sticks of timber, but to a venerated personality, and notwithstanding the work of time and war, as she lies at the Charlestown Navy-Yard to-day, almost at the very spot where she first kissed the waters one hundred years ago, to the popular mind she is precisely the same ship as when she won her resplendent victories.

Nelson's flagship, the Victory, was an old ship before the Constitution was built, and yet she has been reverently and affectionately preserved by the British people, and during the Trafalgar Centennial she was the central object of all England. Shall we do less with "Old Ironsides?"

This artistic petition, with the beautiful drumhead painting, was prepared by a very talented artist, Mr. Eric Pape. It is signed by the governor and all the living ex-governors of our Commonwealth who have had an opportunity to sign it; by seventy mayors and ex-mayors; by twenty-five survivors of the crew which preserved her from capture in 1861, and received the thanks of Congress for that service; by twelve of the grandchildren of Bainbridge, and by descendants of Stewart and Hull, the heroes who commanded her when her three brilliant victories were won, and by Mrs. Susan L. Clark, nearly 90 years of age, now living in Boston, who is the daughter of the man who was fifer upon the Constitution in all of her three great battles. It is also signed by 30,000 citizens of the Commonwealth. These names were collected in less than three weeks. I believe the people of the country almost unanimously, if they had the opportunity, would add their names to this petition, and that it would shock their patriotism to have the suggestions of the Secretary carried out, either that the old ship be broken up or that she be taken out to sea and used as a target for American guns.

Certainly the carrying out of the last suggestion would shatter a celebrated legend of the Navy, for the sailors who fought upon her decks said that cannon balls could not penetrate the sides of the Constitution, and so they affectionately called her "Old Ironsides." Enshrined as she is in the hearts of the people, she should be preserved as a sublime object lesson in patriotism as long as she can be kept together, not merely from the fate that the Secretary of War suggested, but also the fate the poet Holmes so scornfully resented:

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
Where knelt the vanquished foe,
When winds were hurrying o'er the flood
And waves were white below,
No more shall feel the victor's tread
Or know the conquered knee—
The harpies of the shore shall pluck
The eagle of the sea!

[Great applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the petition be read at the Clerk's desk and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House, and I want to say very briefly that I agree with all that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] has said regarding the preservation of the frigate Constitution, popularly known and affectionately called by the American people "Old Ironsides." At the beginning of this session I introduced into this House a resolution protesting against the wanton destruction of "Old Ironsides." That resolution is pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I am assured by the chairman of that committee that in the next naval bill there will be a provision carrying an appropriation of enough money to preserve and protect for future generations all that remains of this grand old frigate, whose brilliant achievements are so familiar to every student of the history of the American Navy. This good old ship must not be destroyed. The patriotic sentiment of America demands her preservation. So long as one of her planks remains she will represent an heroic and patriotic sentiment that is all that we are, all that we have been, and all that we hope to be. I am glad that in response to my resolution and the speech I subsequently made in favor of it there comes to this House this tremendous petition, signed by thousands and thousands of citizens of our country, many of whom are among the most distinguished names in all our land. This great petition should be received and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and subsequently placed in the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the eloquent Chaplain of the House prayed this morning for the preservation of this good old ship. I want that prayer printed to-day in the RECORD. It was eloquent and patriotic. I rejoice that the people of this country—the liberty-loving people—have sent to this House this great patriotic petition, signed by so many eminent American citizens, whose love of all that is great and grand and glorious in our country has been aroused. I know that sentiment, and I know that the American people are against the ruthless and wanton destruction of "Old Ironsides." I know the patriotic sentiment of our people, I believe in it, and I fervently pray that it may live and animate every Member of this House, so that the appropriation to protect and preserve "Old Ironsides" will be carried, when it comes before us, by an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection made to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, respectfully petition your honorable bodies to enact such legislation as may in your wisdom be necessary to save and preserve from destruction and decay the ancient and renowned frigate Constitution, known as "Old Ironsides," in order that we and our posterity may be permitted to behold this precious relic of our first American Navy, and thereby be reminded of and inspired by her glorious history.

Your memorialists further represent that to the citizens of the United States an historical interest attaches to this old American frigate, such as attaches perhaps to no other ship in maritime annals, and as there is no demand or necessity for its demolition, we most earnestly pray that you save the Constitution.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, as supplemental to the eloquence of my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from New York, and the petition that has just been read, it seems to me appropriate to submit the following report from the Committee on Rules at this time.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolution No. 90.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs is hereby directed to investigate the present condition of the U. S. S. Constitution to determine whether in the opinion of that committee an appropriation is justified for the continued maintenance of that ship; and if so, what amount will be required annually for this purpose, and further to report the amount which has been expended annually in maintaining the Constitution since she was put out of commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say that the resolution is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

NATIONAL PARK AT MURFREESBORO, TENN.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I introduced into the House the bill (H. R. 11951) making a national park of the Stone River battlefield, near Murfreesboro, Tenn. There is a map made by a civil engineer, which I have embraced as a part of this bill, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House for an order that this map may be printed in the bill as a part of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that a map made by a civil engineer referred to in the bill introduced by him, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, shall be printed as a part of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, by reason of confusion on the floor it was not possible to hear what the gentleman said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. MANN. I heard what the Speaker said, but I could not hear what the gentleman from Tennessee said.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is a bill introduced for the purpose of making a national park of the Stone River battlefield, near Murfreesboro, Tenn. A map has been made by a civil engineer defining the boundaries of the territory embraced, and it is an essential part of the bill, and necessary to determine and define the boundaries of the national park and the territory embraced therein, and I ask unanimous consent that the map be printed as a part of the bill.

Mr. MANN. What will be the cost of it?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not prepared to answer as to the cost of it. It is usual, I am informed, to have maps printed as a part of bills of this kind. I will state that it is necessary in order to have the committee properly consider the bill that the map should be made a part of it.

Mr. MANN. How large a map will it be?

Mr. HOUSTON. I should say from 15 to 18 inches square, in the neighborhood of that, not over that.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity for having the map printed in the bill. The map can be referred to and the committee can have it for consideration with the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that by the terms of the bill the map is made a part of it and should go in as a part of the bill. It could not in its present form be introduced unless the map is a part of it. To leave out the map would require changing the bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question? Does the gentleman think that if this bill became a law it would be necessary to print the map as a part of the statute? And would not that be an innovation quite beyond precedent to put in a diagram as a part of a statute?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think not. I think there are statutes passed that have diagrams, perhaps maps, similar to this one in order to set forth definitely the boundaries of the space or territory covered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have seen a great many statutes that I thought might be elucidated by being illustrated, but I never saw one yet that was.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I think that of all the bills before the Military Committee for national parks in none of them has there been any map printed with the bill, but in all cases parties desiring the parks have submitted maps for the information of the committee, and in some of the reports I think there have been diagrams and maps printed with the report, but in no case do I remember of any map being printed with the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say this, that this bill was introduced in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and this map was introduced as a part of that bill and was printed with the bill, and I have a copy of that now. This is the bill that was introduced in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and it was amended by this committee to the effect that the map be attached, and it was so attached and printed by the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HULL. I would call attention to the fact that we have never had a bill up of that kind.

Mr. HOUSTON. The bill was recommended for passage by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. If it was done, then there is no reason why the map should be printed now. Why can't it be referred to the committee? And if the committee report and find that it is a necessary part of the bill, it can be reported in that way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I would like to make a motion that the House make an order ordering this map printed.

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would be in order only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOUSTON. It seems that I can not get that. [Laughter.]

COMBINATION BETWEEN PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY AND OTHERS.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to forthwith report to the House of Representatives, for its information, whether there exists at this time, or heretofore within the last twelve months there has existed, a combination or arrangement between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, and the Northern Central Railway Company, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, or any two or more of said railroad companies, in violation of the act passed July 2, 1890, and entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or acts amendatory thereof; and the said Attorney-General is also requested to report to this House all the facts upon which he bases his conclusion.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not privileged. It asks for the opinion of the Attorney-General. I have no objection to the facts being asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that this is not, under the rules, a privileged resolution. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] withhold his point of order for five minutes?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I shall not. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas if he desires to address himself to the point of order. The Chair will hear him briefly.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that this resolution more than ten days ago was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and that that committee has taken no action upon it. It calls for information. It calls for the facts—information as to whether or not such a combination exists between these railroad companies—and the conclusion of the resolution is that the Attorney-General be requested to report to this House all the facts upon which he bases his conclusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] to the concluding clause of the resolution:

And the said Attorney-General is also requested to report to this House all the facts upon which he bases his conclusion.

Now, the Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman answering the suggestion that the last two lines of the resolution—if the resolution were otherwise in order or not—under the precedent do not suggest that an opinion is also asked, which would destroy the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I am not versed in parliamentary matters, but——

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggested to the gentleman that he would be glad to hear the gentleman upon this point. The House undoubtedly has power to call for facts. And under the rule, where a resolution privileged within the meaning of the rule is referred to a committee and is not reported within a certain time, it is in order to move to discharge the committee and bring the resolution before the House for consideration. But that rule applies to a resolution calling for facts and information. Now, the query the Chair puts to the gentleman is, Does not the concluding lines in these words "and the facts upon which he bases his conclusion" show that what is practically asked for is the conclusion or opinion of the Attorney-General or the head of the Department of Justice, and does not that destroy, under the rule, the privileged character of the resolution?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If the concluding portion of the resolution was so changed as to call for all the facts upon this question, as well as those upon which he bases his conclusion, would that be in order?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair would have to meet that question when it arose. We only can deal now, so far as the point of order is concerned, with the resolution with what it contains.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the point in question which seems to be in doubt in the Speaker's mind is, "And the said Attorney-General is also requested to report to this House the facts upon which he bases his conclusion." Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend this resolution does not call for a conclusion. It is not asking for the conclusion of the Attorney-General. What is it asking for? It is purely and simply asking for a statement of facts, which the House has a right to do.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the first part of the resolution. It asks the Attorney-General to report whether these roads have violated a certain law. Now, that must be a conclusion or opinion of the Attorney-General as to whether they have violated the law or not. The whole resolution is founded upon the opinion or conclusion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from New York in reference to that case the clause the Speaker has called to the attention of the gentleman who offered the resolution is the determining clause in the resolution, which says what he wants. It says what this House wants if the resolution passes. And what is that? It does not ask for a conclusion. It asks for the facts; it asks for a statement. Here is the determining question in this case, Mr. Speaker. If the House passes this resolution, what answer will the Attorney-General make? Will he send to this House his conclusion in this case, or will he send to the House the facts that he considered in coming to this conclusion? Manifestly he will send to the House the facts that he considered when he came to his conclusion, because the gentleman calls for those facts very clearly in his statement where he says, "And is also requested to report to this House all the facts upon which he bases his conclusion."

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. In reading the resolution without the last line the Chair might perhaps have a doubt as to whether it were a resolution of inquiry asking for facts or one asking for an opinion. Now, the Chair is perfectly clear that, under the precedents, if the resolution is to be made privileged, it must be a resolution of inquiry as to facts existing, something in esse. It seems to the Chair that a resolution asking an opinion from the head of a Department would not be privileged. While it is in the power, the Chair apprehends, for the House by resolution to ask an opinion of the head of a Department, it occurs to the Chair that such a resolution would not be privileged and would not come within the rule that is now invoked. But whatever the ruling of the Chair might be, were it not for the concluding line or lines of the resolution it is perfectly patent to the Chair that what is desired by the resolution is not the facts alone, if at all, but the conclusion or opinion of the Attorney-General. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES OF INDIANS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the request of the gentleman, he calls up the bill for consideration at this time under the rules of the House. The bill in on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and if consent was given it would have to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, pending the request, I understand it to be the case that the committee has come to the conclusion to so amend the bill that it will meet with the unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. I so understand it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think there are some amendments to this bill that should be made. There are numerous provisions in the bill that should be enacted at once; for instance, the schools in that Territory will close in February, and it is absolutely necessary that we should make some provision for winding up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. We think the matter should be considered. I shall have some amendments to offer.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman will have time in which to offer his amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The motion of Mr. CURTIS was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, with Mr. OVERSTREET in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5976, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, in 1893 the first step was taken by Congress to change the conditions that existed in the Indian Territory. In that year a Commission was created to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and to report any progress they might make to Congress. This Commission was unsuccessful in making any agreement with the tribes, or either of them, for a number of years. In 1896, the Commission having been unable to make any agreement providing for the changing of conditions in the Territory, Congress authorized it to make rolls of the various tribes. Under that law very little, if anything, was done. The conditions were so bad in the Territory that by 1897 Congress concluded that drastic legislation was needed to change them. The Commission that was appointed reported a measure that did not meet with the approval of the committee, and nothing was done that year. But in 1898 a bill was prepared, introduced, and enacted into law authorizing the Commission not only to negotiate with the various tribes, but also to allot the use and occupancy of lands of the tribes to the various members, so as to give to each member his share of the lands of the tribe to which he belonged.

After this act was passed and the tribes were convinced that Congress was in earnest and intended to change the conditions then existing in the Indian Territory, they entered into agreements with the Commission. Those agreements were submitted to Congress and approved. Without going into detail, the treaties or agreements provided for a division of the lands among the members and for the settlement of all their affairs. Each agreement provided for the termination of the tribal government on the 4th of March, 1906.

So, gentlemen of the committee, it is important that this bill be passed, because when the 4th of March arrives there will be a great number of things to be disposed of in that Territory, and their settlement should be provided for. The first four sections of this bill contain all necessary provisions for the closing of the rolls of each tribe, and I think it only fair to the House to give a short statement as to what has been done toward closing the rolls. In the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations there were 66,217 applications for citizenship filed. Of these, 34,232 have been allowed, 2,860 remain undisposed of, of whom 1,539 are children who enrolled under the act of March 3, 1905, and the others have been rejected. There are on the rolls of these tribes 20,913 Indians, 2,105 intermarried whites, 2,105 freedmen, and 2,079 children. In the Cherokee Nation there were 46,464 applications, of which 36,000 of all classes have been enrolled, and there are 1,674 to be acted upon, and 2,730 intermarried whites, of whom 1,587 have a case pending in the Supreme Court of the United States to settle their rights. It is believed that these cases will be settled within a month or two. On the Cherokee rolls there are 32,781 by blood, 4,094 freedmen, and 1,143 intermarried whites.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Have those of the Cherokee tribe who were slaves or the children of slaves, and who were removed from the nation without their consent, been enrolled, or has provision for their enrollment been made?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I think ample provision has been made for their enrollment, and under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior a number of them who did not return within the time required by the treaty of 1866 have been enrolled; and I think it is only fair, in view of the fact that this section was prepared by the Department, to believe that it will carry out the same policy in regard to enrolling freedmen in the future that it has in the past. In the original act, known as the "Curtis Act," the Cherokee freedmen were to be enrolled in accordance with the decision of the Court of Claims rendered in 1896, and I believe the Department has been following that decision.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask my colleague, if the bill does not specifically provide for the right of those who were alienated from the Cherokee Nation, or removed from the nation without their consent, if not already enrolled, if he would object to an amendment making it clear that they, between now and the time of closing the rolls, might be enrolled?

Mr. CURTIS. My judgment is that section 3 of the bill already provides for their cases, and, as I said a minute ago, as the Secretary of the Interior has already determined that some who did not return within the six months can be enrolled if they make a proper showing that they were actually residents of the Territory at the time, required by the treaty, or that they returned as required by the terms of said agreement, there should be no trouble in the freedmen cases.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does my colleague think that all who were removed, as I have indicated, are amply provided for?

Mr. CURTIS. That is my judgment. Of course I do not know what the Secretary will hold under this section; but we have every reason to believe he will act in the future as in the past.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Would my colleague object, then, to having such a provision made as will leave it beyond question?

Mr. CURTIS. I would object to any amendment to this section or any other section of the bill which is liable to open up the question and prevent a settlement of the rolls for any considerable number of months. These people have had since 1896 to file their application. They have had ample notice; and I shall object to any amendment the object of which is to delay the final settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. If a satisfactory amendment on that subject were offered, I should not object to it; but if it were offered and I thought it would delay the final settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, I should earnestly oppose its being adopted by the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will state that I agree with my colleague, that no amendment should be made that would delay the closing up of the work of the Commission, but I think provision should be made for the protection of the rights of those to whom I have referred.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest to the gentleman that he wait until we take the bill up by sections, and if he has any amendment to offer to that section, that he offer it after the section is read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

In the Creek Nation there are 20,120 applications; 17,054 have been enrolled and 1,818 are still pending, of whom 800 are children. On the Creek rolls there are 10,046 Indians, 5,599 freedmen, and 688 children under the act of March 3, 1905.

In the Seminoles the rolls have been virtually completed. There were 2,757 enrolled. Since the rolls were completed 348 children have been added under the act of March 3, 1895, and 50 applications for children are still pending. On the Seminole rolls there are 2,752 Indians, 112 freedmen, and 348 children under the act of March 3, 1905.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do the rolls show the percentage of full bloods?

Mr. CURTIS. We can not give the percentage of full bloods, because it is unknown. It is supposed that there are about 18,000 full-blood Indians in the Indian Territory.

Section 5 of the bill provides for the issuing of patents and deeds. Of course, it is absolutely necessary, and no discussion of it is required at this time. Section 6 provides that the chiefs may be continued, or such chiefs as are recognized by the Secretary of the Interior shall be continued, and authorized to sign deeds and transact certain other business for the tribes. That is necessary because the original agreements provided that the deeds shall be signed by the chief of the tribe.

Section 7 provides for the appraisal of certain timber sections in the Choctaw country.

Under the original agreement the pine-timber lands were not to be allotted and such lands were reserved, by the terms of the agreement, from allotment. In appraising and reserving the lands a few sections were overlooked. None of this land has been allotted, and so it is excluded from allotment and provision is made that if any person does take his allotment from the timber sections he shall take it at its appraised value, including the appraised value of the timber, so that he will have no advantage over other members of the tribe. Section 8 requires that the officer in charge of the various records after the 4th of March shall furnish to the members of the tribe copies of the record, and shall furnish them to the officers of the Government, and provides that any outside person desiring copies may secure them at a regular fee.

Section 9 makes all necessary provisions for the disposition of all records that may be in the hands of any officer of the tribes on the 4th of March, 1906, and requires that they be turned over to some officer to be named by the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 10 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to assume control of the schools in the Indian Territory. This is the section referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] a few moments ago. The tribal governments expiring on the 4th of March, leaves, unless this act is passed, absolutely no provision for the education of the Indian children in the Indian Territory, and by this act we place the schools in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and authorize him to use an amount of money necessary to maintain these schools, not greater than was used last year for the same purpose by each tribe. This provision is to continue until a State or Territory is organized, at which time the management of the schools is to be turned over to the State or Territory.

There are now in the Indian Territory 15,549 Indian children attending school. It cost last year to maintain those schools from funds owned by the Indian tribes $422,000. There were 20,686 white children attending schools outside of the cities and towns in the Territory, and it cost this Government to maintain those schools $98,352.

The enrollment in the Choctaw Nation amounts to 11,330 children. There are 4 academies, 9 boarding schools, and 209 day schools. The cost of maintaining these schools last year was $138,000. The Chickasaws have 152 day schools, 12 day schools for colored children, and the total enrollment is 2,500. The cost last year was $125,000.

The Seminoles have 14 day schools for white and Indian children and 2 day schools for colored children, and the maintenance of the schools last year cost $15,000.

The Creeks have 7 boarding schools for whites and Indians, 3 boarding schools for colored children, 69 day schools for white and Indian children, and 38 day schools for colored children. The total enrollment is 6,786, and the total cost was $79,000.

In the Cherokee Nation there are 4 boarding schools, 117 day schools for Indians and whites, and 4 day schools for colored children; 129 day schools to which only Indians are admitted. The total enrollment was 13,274, and the cost was $133,000.

Section 11 of the bill provides for the collection of all revenues of the tribes by an officer to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. This is absolutely necessary, because after the 4th of March there will be no officer of the tribe authorized to collect the revenues that may be due to the tribes.

Section 12 provides for the sale of all the lots in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. I may state for the benefit of the House that there has been 62,958 acres of land reserved for towns in the Indian Territory. There are 300 towns in the five nations, with a population of 250,000.

In the Creek country there are 26 towns, with an acreage of 10,000 and a population of 52,000. In the Cherokee nation there are 53 towns, with an acreage of 9,000 and a population of 37,000. In the Chickasaw nation there are 131 towns, with an acreage of 23,000 and a population of 79,000. In the Choctaw nation there are 90 towns, with an acreage of 18,000 and a population of 80,000. The surveying of the town is practically completed and nearly all the work has been completed, except the collection of the money that may be due for the sale of town lots and settling of a few contested cases. The total amount collected for the sale of town lots to date is $2,087,504.

Section 13 provides for the sale of unleased coal and asphalt lands and deposits in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. I should state that the original bill provided for the sale of both leased and unleased lands. The subcommittee having charge of the bill proposed an amendment to the effect that parties holding leases—I will give the number in a few moments—should have a preferential right in buying lands covered by their leases, but the committee, after the statement was made showing the amount of revenues derived each year from the coal royalties, thought it best to reserve the leased land from sale, and so in this bill as reported provision is made for the sale of unleased land only.

At a meeting of the committee this morning an amendment was authorized, which will be offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], reserving all the lands from sale at this time and providing for the leasing of the unleased lands, so that all the coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw country may be placed on the same footing, and leaving the question of the sale of the land to some future Congress. It was thought, after due consideration, that this was best for all concerned, as to sell the unleased lands and leave the leased lands in their present condition would be a great injustice to men who have invested their money in that Territory, have developed the coal business, and are paying a royalty of 8 cents upon the coal.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman from Kansas if there is any segregation of lands in the Indian Territory for school purposes?

Mr. CURTIS. There has been no segregation made by Congress except the lands used by the tribes. This bill does provide that the new Territory or new State, when organized, may buy the various school reservations. In the statehood bill it is provided that the new State shall have $5,000,000 in lieu of the land in the Indian Territory. All the school lands reserved for allotment for the use and benefit of the tribe must be disposed of by the terms of existing agreement, and so this bill provides for their sale.

There were 4,450 acres of the lands of the Choctaws and Chickasaws reserved from allotment because they were supposed to contain valuable deposits of coal and asphalt. There are 109 coal leases and 10 asphalt leases, covering 108,000 acres of land, which would leave 340,000 acres unleased coal lands in the Chickasaw and Choctaw country. The following statement gives full information in regard to the coal lands:

Output of coal, 1899–1905.

[Choctaw and Chickasaw lands: 450,000 acres reserved from allotment; 109 coal and 10 asphalt leases, covering 108,280 acres.]

Year.	Tons.	Royalty.
1900	1,900,127	138,486
1901	2,398,156	199,663
1902	2,735,365	247,361
1903	3,187,035	261,929

The coal royalty is 8 cents per ton.

There are 10 asphalt leases; royalty, $2,569.80 last year. The royalty is 60 cents per ton on refined, 10 cents on crude.

The coal operators pay a royalty of 8 cents per ton and the asphalt operators pay a royalty of 60 cents a ton on refined and 10 cents per ton on crude asphalt. In the Cherokee Nation there are 3,830 gas leases, only 1,294 of which have been approved, and the others are pending.

There are 18 coal leases; three have been sent up for approval. There are three marble and stone leases, and one only has been sent up for approval. There are four iron leases, none of which have been transmitted for approval; nine lead and zinc leases not acted upon. In the Creek country there have been filed 269 applications for oil and gas leases; 85 sent up for approval, and 184 are pending. There were 31 coal and asphalt leases, all sent up to the Secretary of the Interior for action; one limestone lease, upon which no action has been taken.

Section 14 authorizes any persons, corporations, or organizations for whom lands have been reserved to buy the same and secure an absolute title. Under the agreements they simply have the right to use them for the purposes for which they were reserved. The tribes go out of existence on the 4th of March, and your committee thought it best to provide that if the holders of the lands so reserved desired to buy and pay a consideration for the same they should be allowed to secure an absolute title.

Sections 15, 16, and 17 make necessary provision for the sale of all buildings and other property belonging to the various tribes and to provide for the sale of surplus lands and the final distribution of the funds of the tribes.

The Choctaws and Chickasaws have 11,000,000 acres of land, of which 6,000,000 acres have been allotted. Four million acres are to be disposed of. The Cherokees have about 4,400,000 acres subject to allotment. Three million five hundred thousand acres have already been allotted. It will take the 857,000 acres remaining to fulfill the agreement with the tribes in making allotment. The Creeks own 3,000,000 acres of land. Two million four hundred thousand acres are available for allotment. Six hundred and six thousand acres remain unallotted. Nearly all the patents have been issued to the members of this tribe and have been delivered. The Seminoles own 368,000 acres of land. All of it has been allotted except 18,900 acres, which will be equally divided among the children who are entitled to enrollment and to have allotments under the act of March 3, 1905. There are pending now only 2,776 contest cases growing out of the allotment of all that vast area of land—nearly 20,000,000 acres.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. As I understand it, this bill has been unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. SULZER. And the Indians of the Indian Territory whom it affects are all in favor of it.

Mr. CURTIS. I could not say they are all in favor of it. Those that had delegations here did not object to it. They made suggestions or amendments which were accepted by the subcommittee. They were satisfactory to the Indians, and they claimed to be perfectly satisfied. Two of the tribes were not represented, or rather the representative was in the room, and when asked if he had anything to say, made no complaint and made no suggestions.

Mr. SULZER. Just another question along that line. Is the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in favor of this bill?

Mr. CURTIS. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Dawes Commission and a committee appointed by the Secretary of the Interior have carefully gone over the bill; in fact, prepared most of its provisions. It can be called a "Department" bill.

Mr. SULZER. And in the judgment of the gentleman from Kansas this bill will really be for the benefit of the Indians and the tribes that the bill affects?

Mr. CURTIS. Not only for their benefit, but it is absolutely necessary that it should be passed before the 4th day of March, and I want to state that I have simply taken up the time of the committee, not believing it is necessary at all, but in order that a few of the facts might be placed in the RECORD, so that if anything comes up in the future the data will be at hand to be used.

Mr. MURDOCK. In that connection I wish the gentleman would go into a résumé of what the Dawes Commission has done and explain to us if it is true or not, as stated, that the Dawes Commission in its work failed to provide roads for the Indian Territory.

Mr. CURTIS. The Dawes Commission would have no authority to provide roads. That is a question wholly for Congress and for the tribes, and in the treaties or agreements with the tribes where roads are provided for they have been established or laid out, but on the lands belonging to the other three there are no provisions in reference to roads, and it was thought best not to go into that question in this bill, as we hope that Oklahoma and the Indian Territory will soon be one great State of this Union, and then the new State can enact all necessary road legislation.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, when Oklahoma and the Territory do become one State, Oklahoma will pay for the Indian Territory's roads?

Mr. CURTIS. I should say not, because under the road laws provision is made for the condemnation of roads, and it is paid out of a local fund, and I judge from what I know of the desire of most of the Indians that they would willingly donate sufficient land for all necessary roads.

Mr. MURDOCK. In what two nations have roads been provided?

Mr. CURTIS. I would not be sure, but my recollection is that the agreements with the Cherokees and the Creeks provide for the establishment of roads and highways. I started to say when interrupted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] that the tribal funds are as follows:

Cherokee asylum fund	$64,147.17
Cherokee national fund	1,428,543.21
Cherokee orphan fund	374,679.31
Cherokee school fund	851,919.21
Total	2,729,288.90

To which must be added money derived from sale of town lots and other property.

Chickasaw national fund	$1,206,695.66
Chickasaw national fund	60,000.00
Total	1,266,695.66

To which must be added money from sale of lots and other property.

Choctaw general fund	$390,259.92
Choctaw orphan fund	39,710.69
Choctaw school fund	49,472.70
Total	827,966.31

To which must be added town lots and other property.

Creek general fund	$1,473,562.95
Creek general fund	200,000.00
Total	1,948,730.95

Add town-lot sales and other property.

Seminole general fund	$1,500,000.00
Seminole general fund	500,000.00

Section 18 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to bring all suits that may be necessary in order to settle up the affairs of any of the tribes. Section 19 removes all the restrictions upon the sale of lands owned by members of the tribe except full-bloods and minors and except as to homesteads. There has been considerable contest over this provision. A few years ago an act was passed removing the restriction upon all intermarried whites and the freedmen. The Department held that the right to sell did not include the right to lease. This bill as originally drawn and introduced excepted leases from the provision removing restriction, but the committee voted that the right to sell should include the right to lease, so the section was so amended by the committee. The degree of blood is to be settled by the rolls of the tribes, and I might state for the benefit of the House that the rolls give the quantum of blood of each member upon the rolls. Section 20 provides for making of leases. I should say, however, that section 19 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to remove the restriction as to full-bloods upon proper application and showing. Section 21 provides for the sale of inherited Indian lands.

A few years ago a general provision was passed authorizing inherited Indian lands to be sold. The Department held that the provision did not apply to lands inherited in the Indian Territory, so the committee thought it necessary to add this section. The bill further provides that any Indian may make a will, because under the terms of agreement the courts in the Indian Territory, as I am informed, have held that an Indian in the Territory has no right to dispose of his property by will. The section added to the bill, 23, provides that they may make wills, and that the will of a full blood shall be acknowledged before a United States judge or before a United States commissioner. Your committee deem such a provision necessary in order to fully protect the interest of the full bloods. Your committee also recommended that the laws of inheritance, descent, and distribution for the Territory of Oklahoma be extended over the Indian Territory because it was thought they were better than the laws of Arkansas, which have heretofore been extended. There are a great many complications about the inheritance laws of Arkansas which I shall not attempt to discuss upon the floor of this House, because I am not a practicing lawyer at the Arkansas bar, and I might make some mistake, but I am advised by Arkansas lawyers that they do have a little trouble, and your committee thought it would be better to extend the laws of Oklahoma.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, in conclusion I want to call your attention to this fact: The Dawes Commission has passed upon the rights of nearly 90,000 Indians and to their interest in 20,000,000 acres of land. They have had many hard questions to settle, because upon their findings depended the rights of the various Indian applications to share in the division of the lands and moneys of the tribes.

They have passed upon 135,000 applications for enrollment. They have admitted some 90,000. Of all the applications—135,000—there are only 6,400 still pending. The officers of the Government have surveyed, platted, appraised, and sold the lots in 300 towns in that country. Those towns had a population of 250,000 people, and many of them had rights which had to be considered and settled. These towns cover 62,000 acres of land. They have allotted over 12,000,000 acres of land in the Indian Territory. They have looked after the interests of the tribes. And from the organization of the Dawes Commission down to the present time, the total cost to this Government in settling that vast estate—the greatest trust that any nation in the world has ever been called upon to administer—has been $1,925,000.

Much has been said about the Dawes Commission and the officers in the Indian Territory. There has been much said about the squandering of the money of the people. But I submit that no trust of that magnitude could be settled at that little expense by any private individual in this country or in any court of the United States of America. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen of this committee, it is important that this legislation pass and become a law before the 4th of March next, and I hope this committee will act upon the sections as speedily as possible. I reserve the balance of my time, and am ready to yield to any gentleman on the other side. [Applause.]

Mr. MCNARY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. MCNARY. I would like to ask him, owing to my ignorance of this matter and inability to get a report, they all being out, apparently, exactly what provisions have been made in regard to the coal, oil, and mineral lands?

Mr. CURTIS. I stated a moment ago, if the gentleman please, that in the original bill a provision was made for the sale of the leased and unleased coal lands. The committee determined it was best to reserve the leased lands from sale, and so provide in this bill for the sale of only the unleased coal lands. But at the meeting of the committee this morning a member of the committee was directed to prepare an amendment which will reserve from sale all of the coal lands and provide for the leasing of the unleased coal lands. The committee believed that the operators in the Territory who have invested their money were entitled to this protection, and that some policy should be adopted by this or some other Congress to dispose of all the coal lands at one time, so as to protect all of the interests of the parties having money invested there. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is to offer the amendment.

Mr. MCNARY. Does that apply to the oil lands and asphalt lands and mineral lands?

Mr. CURTIS. It applies to the asphalt lands. But the oil in the Indian Territory goes to the owner of the land.

Mr. MCNARY. And the mineral land—the lead or other lands?

Mr. CURTIS. Coal and asphalt are the only minerals reserved from allotment.

Mr. MCNARY. May I ask also, as a matter of information, to what use are the funds which are derived from these leases put? Is it a common fund, as it was in the past, or how are they going to be divided?

Mr. CURTIS. It is placed to the credit of the tribe as a common fund, and after all the necessary expenses that have been provided and to be paid out of that fund are paid the balance shall be divided among the members of the two tribes—the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

Mr. McNARY. And that will continue under these leases?

Mr. CURTIS. That will continue until we make some further disposition of the coal lands. I might say to the gentleman that I hope even in this Congress some provision will be made for the disposition of the coal and asphalt lands, so that we may settle all of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes within the next two years.

Mr. McNARY. One further question, Mr. Chairman. I find here a provision in section 16, page 15, as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be permitted to sell to any association or person 100,000 acres of land not valuable for agricultural, mineral, or timber purposes at not less than its appraised value, under such rules and regulation as he may prescribe, to be reserved for a game preserve only.

Mr. CURTIS. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that provision. I had no note of it and overlooked it. The law as it is authorizes the Secretary to dispose of all unallotted lands. There will be in the Choctaw and Chickasaw country one or two million acres of land not fit for agriculture, mining, or for any other purpose, because of the fact that it is mountainous. The committee was advised the Secretary did not care to sell a tract of 100,000 acres to any one person or company without direct authority of Congress, and your committee thought that such land was worthless, practically, except for this purpose.

Mr. McNARY. Worthless for grazing? Could this be used for grazing?

Mr. CURTIS. It is worthless for grazing, so I am informed; and it was thought best by your committee to authorize the Secretary, in his discretion, to sell that amount to any person or company if he could find such a purchaser. I may state now that there is such a firm, a corporation, which desires to buy that amount of land to be used as a game preserve only, but the committee thought it best not to authorize the sale of that amount of land to a certain person or company, but to authorize the Secretary to sell to any person or company if, in his discretion, he thought it best to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Now, may I ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, why would it not be a fair amendment to that proposition to insert: "Provided, That if the land is used for any other purpose except as a game preserve it reverts back?"

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, the committee considered that proposition, and we were faced with the fact that on the 4th of March tribal relations expired.

Mr. McNARY. The leases do not.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, the leases will be ended within a few years, and it was more than likely that if a game preserve was established it would last longer than the handling of the tribal property, and the question was raised, of course, to whom it should revert—to the tribes or to the United States Government—and the committee thought it best to leave that matter open. I will state for the committee that I have no objection to an amendment providing that if the land is not used, or ever be abandoned, for that purpose, it shall revert to the United States.

Mr. McNARY. I will suggest an amendment of that character. That would meet the only objection I have to the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, the gentleman can prepare an amendment of that kind.

Mr. McNARY. I will offer an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. If the gentleman will offer an amendment of that character, there will be no objection on the part of the committee.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say that the rolls of the various tribes have been practically completed.

Mr. CURTIS. I gave the number of pending applications.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Now, under the different acts to which the gentleman referred, as I understand it, applicants were required to present their applications within a specified time, with certain other limitations with respect to residence. Now, what effect will the provisions of this proposed bill have upon the rights of parties to make application for membership of these different tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. In my judgment, it prevents any further application.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Well, I will ask this question: As the gentleman understands the existing law, can applications be filed now for admission into any of these tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. I should say no; and my judgment is that the first four sections of the bill are unnecessary, and that the Secretary now has the right to close these rolls any minute he pleases to order it; but the Secretary has asked to have the date for filing of applications and the closing of the rolls fixed by Congress. The object of the committee is to close the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes as soon as possible.

As I said a few moments ago, the various citizens have had notice since 1896, ten years. It does seem to me, gentlemen of this committee, we have given them sufficient time.

Mr. FLOYD. The laws of inheritance have been changed from those of Arkansas to those of the Territory of Oklahoma. Does that apply to the Indians and whites or only to the Indian lands?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, of course, this bill was drawn only to apply to the Indians; but I submit the courts may hold that, as it extends the laws of Oklahoma over the Indian Territory, it applies to all the people of the Indian Territory, whites as well as Indians. The section reads:

Every person of lawful age and sound mind may by last will and testament devise all of his estate, real and personal, and all interest therein: Provided, That no will of a full-blood Indian devising real estate shall be valid unless acknowledged before a judge of the United States court for the Indian Territory, or a United States Commissioner: Provided further, That the law of the Territory of Oklahoma regulating the descent and distribution of real estate and other property shall apply to all real and personal property in the Indian Territory.

As I said a moment ago, there is a general provision, and my judgment is, while only legislating for the Indians, the courts may hold that the section applies to all the people and property in the Indian Territory.

Now, if there are no other questions, I am ready to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas or Texas, or any other gentleman who desires to speak upon this question.

If there are no further questions, I am ready to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] or to any other gentleman who desires to speak on the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CURTIS. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not tell; not long.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will take the floor in my own right, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning or near the beginning of the last century, the Five Civilized Tribes lived on the east side of the Mississippi River. The Congress of the United States determined to remove them to the west. They set apart what is known as the "Indian Territory," that country now owned by the five tribes, as an Indian reservation, designating a certain portion of that Territory as the home of each tribe. Congress permitted these Indians to keep up their tribal relations, consisting in some cases of tribal chiefs and in others of governors.

That relation existed until about the year 1890, when Congress determined to change its Indian policy, to destroy these tribal relations, to do away with the Indian governors and legislatures, and to assume control of the Indian affairs through Congressional action.

It became necessary, in the judgment of Congress, to pass a bill to that effect, to create a commission to treat with these Indians as tribes, because they had always heretofore been treated as tribes, as a separate body of individuals, having separate and independent rights. This commission was known as the "Dawes Commission," because Governor and former Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, headed it. That commission was in existence ten or twelve years. It has now gone out of existence, and is represented by Mr. Bixby, the late chairman of the commission. In a recent circular issued by him, and which I will put in the RECORD, it appears that there is much unfinished work for that commission to do. The object of the commission, mind you, was to ascertain two things: First, to secure treaties from these various Indian tribes agreeing to dissolve their tribal relations and agreeing to become citizens of the United States. That was made necessary for the reason that the United States patented all of these lands to all of these tribes of Indians, to each one of them separately, and, strange to say, according to Indian language and Indian ideas and customs, the language of those patents from the Government to the Indian tribes reads that the land shall remain their territory as long as grass grows and water runs. In order, then, to do away with that provision and to secure allotments, they had to make a new treaty. This Dawes Commission was charged with the duty of framing these new treaties. They did frame them. These treaties provided that the Indians should have rolls made, and that after these rolls were made the land should be allotted to each individual Indian. That commission has performed about two-thirds of its work. There were 20,000,000 acres of land, in round numbers, and about 12,000,000 only have been allotted to these Indians, leaving, in round numbers, 6,000,000 acres of land still to be allotted to as many Indians as are entitled to it.

The decisions of the Federal courts and, I believe, of the Supreme Court show it to be the policy of the court that the Indians are regarded as the wards of the Government; that they regard the property of these tribes as a trust fund held by Congress, to distribute among the heirs of these various Indians.

There are 6,000,000 acres of land reserved. There are a number of heirs not yet determined, and I will read from the report of the Commission to show you that we have not yet done our work and show you that we have not yet carried out the provisions of the treaty. The treaties made by the Dawes Commission provided that we should make rolls of these Indians. We have not completed those rolls, and I will read from the report of the Commission to show you that fact. I have here the report of the Commission to the Secretary of the Interior for the year June 30, 1905. It states:

The Choctaw and Chickasaw nations have 66,217 applicants enrolled. Identified, 35,000; refused, 27,000; undetermined, 2,000, and, to sum it all up, the grand total of the five tribes, we find that there are 135,000 applicants and that there are still 13,155 undetermined cases.

I object to this bill and shall offer, at the proper time, an amendment reserving the right to keep these 6,000,000 acres of land from being sold and disposed of now until we see whether these 13,155 Indians can prove up their rights to citizenship and to enrollment.

This bill provides, as suggested to the gentleman from Kansas, that on the 4th of June of this year all Indians not enrolled shall be refused enrollment. Let me ask you, if you were an heir entitled to an estate and some legislative body or some court should say that unless you proved your title to the estate by some set time you should be deprived of your patrimony, would you not say that that was an unjust decision? And yet that is exactly what Congress is called upon in this bill to do, and what I apprehend the Members of this House will refuse to do when they understand this question.

Mr. PALMER. How long have they had to do it in?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About twelve years; and these cases are on the way, some of them, to the Supreme Court of the United States. Here is what the Commission says about it:

Such cases as now remain in the hands of the Commission are those which depend on the outcome of pending litigation or the final decisions of the Department upon important legal questions, and it seems that after almost a decade of unceasing toil the task of adjudicating the rights of applicants for enrollment as members of the Five Tribes is about to be completed.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman does not contend that this bill interferes with any cases that are now pending in court? Those applications are already on file.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman state the meaning of the language which was put in by an amendment over my objection in lines 7, 8, and 9, page 3?

Provided, That the rolls of the tribes affected by this act shall be fully completed on or before the 4th day of June, 1906, and the Secretary of the Interior shall have no jurisdiction to approve the enrollment of any person after said date.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman knows that the only people that could be affected by that are the unmarried whites whose cases are now pending before the Supreme Court, and I am told that we shall probably have a decision within the next month or two. I will state to the gentleman that I understand the parties are trying to reach an agreement which will settle the question outside of the courts. There is absolutely no danger with reference to those parties. I stated that if there was any question, that before this bill passed the Senate and the case was not decided the time could be extended as far as those people are concerned. What we want is to close the rolls.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then why put any date in that? Why not state that as soon as the cases are determined which are now legally filed the rolls shall be closed, and not state any particular date in the bill? The gentleman knows the delays that are incident to courts. Some of these cases are going to the Supreme Court of the United States, and yet the gentleman limits it to the 4th day of June. Probably the cases will not be argued by that time. I think it is a very unsafe proposition to put in a bill and ingraft upon a statute. There are 13,000 and more of these people whose rights would be affected by this provision, who have already filed applications. Two thousand of these are known as court-made citizens, and I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if it does not cut those out?

Mr. CURTIS. It cuts out all those that the court decided had no right, and I do not propose that their cases shall be reopened if I can prevent it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the gentleman has all the time insisted that those men should be cut out.

Mr. CURTIS. I object to further padding of the rolls in the Indian Territory. There are thousands whose names have been put on the rolls without right, and I am opposed to having any more added.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will not the gentleman admit that under the act of Congress the courts had jurisdiction in making the rolls? Isn't that a fact?

Mr. CURTIS. There is no use in wasting time; that law has been repealed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Oh, I understand the gentleman's adroitness. Were not these 2,000 persons placed upon that roll under laws existing at the time?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; but 90 per cent of them were placed there by fraud and perjury. It was afterwards investigated by the courts, and they were excluded from the rolls.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What will become of the other 10 per cent, then, you admit must lose their rights?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not admit that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman made the statement that 90 per cent of them were fraudulent.

Mr. CURTIS. Many of the 10 per cent have been placed back on the rolls, and all of those who filed applications before December 1, 1905, have a right under this act to go on with their applications and have their cases acted upon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why, then, do you place this allotment on the 4th of March?

Mr. CURTIS. Because we want to close those rolls.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it necessary that an estate should be closed before you ascertain who the heirs are?

Mr. CURTIS. There is no trouble about that. We will ascertain by that time all the legal parties.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They have been twelve years in court making up their evidence. I say there should not be some definite date set when these rolls should be closed, but all these persons should have a hearing before the Secretary of the Interior or before the Commissioner before the courts shall step in and cut them off absolutely from their inheritance.

There are others to which I wish to call your attention. There is this other matter. There are 6,000,000 acres of this land that is to be sold as surplus land. This bill provides that they shall be sold in unlimited quantities, giving the Secretary of the Interior if he sees proper the right to sell it to one man or one corporation. I offered an amendment, and I shall offer it again, that no more than 160 acres shall be sold to any one person or individual. There is rough land in that country, and after it is ascertained that it will not sell in blocks of 160 acres we can open the doors and sell it in larger quantities. A great deal of this land is valuable land worth from $10 to probably $50 per acre, and why should we permit corporations that have been existing there for years, organized for that very purpose, to beat these very Indians, which have obtained some kind of right from the Indians, and if you pass this bill you will give these men the benefits for which they have plotted and schemed for years. It should be restricted by the amendment, which I have framed and shall offer, to 160 acres to any individual or corporation.

It is in the interest of the country that they have farmers owning the soil and that they ought not to be surrounded by some corporation or some rich man who can buy thousands of acres. Why give the Secretary of the Interior unlimited authority to sell in unlimited quantities, when Congress for almost a century of its existence has limited the quantity to which an individual was entitled of our public domain to 160 acres, and required that man to live on it five years? That is the patrimony and inheritance of the people of the whole United States; and when we come, Members of this House, to administer an estate belonging to Indians we change the rule so that the Secretary of the Interior can take the Indians' land and sell it in unlimited quantities to anybody, a corporation or otherwise, to men who can buy the whole of it in one body. Why do you not treat the Indian as you have treated the white man, our own people? This is good farming country, one of the best portions of our vast domain left—about the only place where the farmer can go and secure a good home, where he can make a living farming without irrigation. Then why should we open a flood gate here and permit this land to be sold in unlimited quantities and under such terms and rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe? Why not limit it to 160 acres of land?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Where is this land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is in the Indian Territory; you know where that is—west of the Mississippi, north of Texas, south of Kansas, and——

Mr. MANN. It does not refer to all the land in the Indian Territory?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; 6,000,000 of the 20,000,000 acres of land is known as "surplus land." These five tribes owned, in round numbers, 20,000,000 acres of land. Twelve millions have been already allotted, leaving now a surplus of 6,000,000 acres, and that surplus is supposed to be sold in unlimited quantities by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Well, what is the character of that land, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The greater portion of it is excellent farm land—the western and central portions. The eastern portion, next to Arkansas, is very rough and mountainous.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman from Texas does not claim that the land remaining unallotted is excellent farming land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. A great deal will be good land.

Mr. CURTIS. I could not agree with the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. MANN. What portion of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to sell in unlimited quantities?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Kansas can give that.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman about a committee amendment, printed on page 15 of the bill, proposing to sell a hundred thousand acres of land to anybody. What is that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They are people who want not a forest reserve, but a game reserve. They are people from my State and other States. These people propose to erect a game reserve. That is all the land they can get hold of in that country. At the present time the Secretary of the Interior has the right to sell it over our objections and protest, but this only gives these people the right to buy it as a game reserve instead of a cattle reserve or anything else.

Mr. MANN. It says "game reserve," and we have no legal definition of a game reserve in this country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; I do not know whether it applies to wild game or game chickens, or something of that kind; I can not tell. I presume, however, it applies to wild game.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether this amendment refers to just 100,000 acres to be sold to one person, or by terms is it permitted to be sold to any number of persons?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Oh, I presume there will be a number of persons. As I understand, there is a company already formed.

Mr. MANN. As I read the amendment, it says:

Sell to any association or person 100,000 acres of land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. They might sell the whole six millions to sixty people.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is what I am objecting to. The Secretary of the Interior can sell it all, and in that I say the bill is wrong. Now, you can prevent this if it can be sold in blocks of 160 acres, and at the end of two or three years the amount could be enlarged.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Secretary of the Interior would sell to some person 100,000 acres of land and put in the deed that it was for a game preserve. Would the gentleman think that would affect the title so as to present the man from selling it for what he pleased?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Not at all, after the title was passed.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, I might say to the gentleman, that is the most remarkable provision I have ever seen in a bill coming to the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I supposed it was a committee amendment, and I supposed the gentleman was in favor of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are a great many things in this bill that the gentleman does not favor. I am pointing out some of them.

Now, with reference to public roads. The greatest necessity in that country, in my judgment, is the demand for public roads. I have drafted an amendment which I propose to offer at proper time providing that all deeds and patents hereafter made to allottees shall not convey the land within 30 feet of any section line, so that the land within 30 feet of the section line around the entire section will still belong to the Indian tribes. And it further provides that after a government has been established there, either a Territorial or State law, that the legislature may condemn this land and pay the Indians for it, and that the money shall be a part of the public school fund, thus providing means of having public roads in that country in the future. Now, some of the tribes in making the treaties with the Dawes Commission, as stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], provided for public roads. Others did not, and there could be no objection, in my judgment, to this provision—letting the Indians retain the title to this land as a tribal title until it becomes extinguished through the Territorial or the State legislature and dedicated for public purposes of highways or roads. I believe these are about the only objections and amendments that I propose to offer to the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the approval of this act no person shall be enrolled as a citizen or freedman of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory, except as herein otherwise provided, unless formal application for enrollment was made prior to December 1, 1905, and the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes shall be conclusive evidence as to the fact of such application; and no motion to reopen or reconsider any citizenship case, in any of said tribes, shall be entertained unless filed with the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes within sixty days from date of the decision complained of: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may enroll persons whose names appear upon any of the tribal rolls and for whom the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes show application was made prior to December 1, 1905, and which was not allowed solely because not made within the time prescribed by law.

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 13, strike out the words "within sixty days from date of the decision complained of" and insert in lieu thereof "on or before March 4, 1906."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all applications for enrollment now pending before the Commissioner shall be passed upon by him.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That touches the point the gentleman suggests, "all applications for enrollment now pending before the Commissioner shall be passed upon by him." I would cut out the idea here, as I think the courts would hold, and as a plain reading of the text here shows, that these rolls must be arbitrarily closed on the 4th of June, and I do not see why he should have any objection to that amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I object to the amendment for this reason: If we provide that all of these rolls shall be closed by a certain time the Secretary will put enough force at work to pass upon all the applications that were filed prior to December 1, 1905, and it authorizes him to do that within the time fixed, and to pass the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas would simply mean to delay action.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman states that the Secretary of the Interior will put sufficient force on to complete the work and pass upon all of the applications before the 4th of March next. When does he expect to get the bill passed and have it become a law? What assurance has the gentleman as to the date?

Mr. CURTIS. I would say to the gentleman that this bill was prepared, that section of it, by the Department. They have the force to do the work, they know the number of cases, and they have asked for an appropriation so as to have the work done as soon as possible.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that all of these cases should be disposed of now, before the rolls are finally closed?

Mr. CURTIS. The law provides that the rolls shall be finally closed, or shall be completed on or before June instead of March.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the contention I make. Why name that date?

Mr. CURTIS. Because it gives the Secretary plenty of time, and we want to close the rolls.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why is it more important to close those rolls than it is to let these Indians have the property that belongs to them?

Mr. CURTIS. They have had plenty of time. Any Indian who is entitled to property down there is going to get it, and the gentleman knows that as well as I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But when they have acted in good faith—brought their cases before the courts of the country—what assurance is there that they will have their day in court?

Mr. CURTIS. They have had their day in court.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What would the gentleman say if there were a proceeding in some probate court where he was one of the parties and he would be told that unless he proved his case within a certain time, say three months in the future, he would lose the suit?

Mr. CURTIS. I would go to work and get my proof in just as the gentleman from Texas would do. If they made it ten days, I would have it there within ten days.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indian tribes are represented by attorneys, yet it is provided in this bill they can appeal their cases to the court, and if it takes two years to reach a decision of the Supreme Court and determine their rights, and in the meantime they should be barred, then what would become of the case?

Mr. CURTIS. The last part of the gentleman's question does not apply, because I think he will find under the original law the decisions of the citizenship court were final.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can not these cases be appealed to the court and are not many of them on their way to the Supreme Court?

Mr. CURTIS. They are in the Supreme Court—all that can be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman state whether the Supreme Court will pass on these cases before the 4th of June?

Mr. CURTIS. I have stated twice that it is the opinion of those who have looked into the question that the cases would be decided not later than March, and if they were not decided before this bill reaches the Senate for final action it can be amended so as to protect the interests of those people.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why not accept my amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not propose to consent to putting in such an amendment without due consideration.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is nothing strange about this language; it simply provides that the cases pending before this Commission shall be determined; and what objection can you have to that?

Mr. CURTIS. They will be determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the Chair expressed himself as in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for ninety days after approval hereof applications may be received for enrollment of children who were minors living March 4, 1905, whose parents have been enrolled in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes, or have applications for enrollment pending at the approval hereof, and for the purpose of enrollment under this section illegitimate children shall take the status of the mother, and allotments shall be made to children so enrolled. If any citizen of the Cherokee tribe shall fail to receive the full quantity of land to which he is entitled as an allotment, he shall be paid out of any of the funds of such tribe a sum equal to twice the appraised value of the amount of land thus deficient. The provisions of section 9 of the Creek agreement ratified by act approved March 1, 1901, authorizing the use of the funds of the Creek tribe for equalizing allotments, are hereby restored and reenacted, and after the expiration of twelve months from the date of the certificate for an allotment of land in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes, no contest shall be instituted against such allotment: Provided, That the rolls of the tribes affected by this act shall be fully completed on or before the 4th day of June, 1906.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 11, page 2, after the word "applications," strike out "may" and insert "shall;" in line 1, page 3, strike out "twelve" and insert "nine;" in line 2, page 3, strike out the words "certificate for" and insert the words "original selection of," and in line 7, after the word "six," insert the following: "and the Secretary of the Interior shall have no jurisdiction to approve the enrollment of any person after said date: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to permit any person to file an application for enrollment in any tribe where the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States, and the application was not filed within the time required by said agreement."

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to perfect that last amendment by adding the word "hereafter" before the word "permit," in line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "United States," in line 13 of the last amendment; so that it will read: "Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to hereafter permit any person to file an application for enrollment in any tribe when the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. A parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move to strike out the last provision after the word "provided," in line 5, down to the end of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment seeking to perfect the section would be the first in order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because it has that arbitrary date, fixing it so that these applications must be filed and concluded before the 1st day of June, 1906. That is the worst provision in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that these amendments ought to be divided and the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kansas first voted upon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Down to the first proviso?

The CHAIRMAN. To the second proviso.

Mr. CURTIS. I would suggest that we vote on all the amendments except those on page 3 down to line 7, because there is no objection to those amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to those.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to taking the vote on these amendments on pages 2 and 3 down to line 7 on page 3?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Line 5.

The CHAIRMAN. There are but two amendments on page 3 before that part of the section to which the gentleman from Kansas addresses his amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But there is an amendment on page 2, line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. CURTIS. We can vote on those amendments. There is no objection to them, and I suggest that they be agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to anything but this fixing the date.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken on the amendment to line 11, page 2, and the amendment, in lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 3.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas to the committee amendment. The Chair will suggest that that amendment be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 10, at the end of the line insert, before the word "permit," the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment just read.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move to strike out all after the word "allotment," in line 5, down to the word "further," in line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand whether the gentleman from Texas understands that the committee amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that they have been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second part of the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 13, 14, and 15, page 3, strike out the words "and the application was not filed within the time required by said agreement."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment just read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the gentleman's amendment as amended.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move to strike out all after the word "allotment," in line 5, down to and including the word "date," in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Division!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the attention of the gentleman from Texas. If the gentleman desires to offer an amendment to strike out all of that portion before the second proviso, that can be done after a vote upon the amendment which is now pending before the committee—that is, that amendment should be voted on, and if it should be voted down, then an amendment to strike out that part of the paragraph will be in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will vote for this committee amendment. I will state that I offered the amendment to strike out the last two lines so there would be no question about the bill relieving all persons who had filed their applications before December 1, 1905, whether they had filed them within the time required by the agreements or not. In fact it is an amendment to help out the gentleman from Texas, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I see that in the first part of this section there is this language:

That for ninety days after the approval hereof applications shall be received for enrollment of children who were minors, living March 4, 1905, whose parents have been enrolled in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes.

And so forth. Now, it says ninety days after the approval of this act. This act may not be approved for ninety days, as far as we know, and it may carry it over beyond the 4th of March. Now, your bill is self-contradictory. Suppose you pass over the 4th of June before you can get these children on the roll. Then the Secretary of the Interior can not put the children on the roll, whom you provide here shall be put on the roll, in the first part of the section. In the first part of the section you provide for putting certain persons on the roll, and in the last part you make it impossible to put them on the roll if it is after the 4th of June.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the gentleman, as I have stated before, the status of the Indian children. Their applications have all been filed, they are all on file now, and there is no question about the children, and they have until the 4th of June to act upon their applications, and I will state that nearly all of them have been passed upon. I gave the figures a few minutes ago.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But the language is that they shall be received for enrollment, not enrolled. That means that the application shall be made that they shall be enrolled; then they have got to produce their proof, and suppose that is contested, and continues on from month to month as these contests do drag on, how will they get their names on the rolls before the 4th of June, which you make an arbitrary date?

Mr. CURTIS. There is no question about the children. As I stated before, the act which we passed some time ago provided for their enrollment, and the applications of nearly all have been filed and most of them acted upon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I should like to ask my colleague the effect of this proviso beginning in line 9:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to permit any person to file an application for enrollment in any tribe where the date for filing application has been fixed by agreement between said tribe and the United States, and the application was not filed within the time required by said agreement.

I should like to know what the provisions of that agreement are that are referred to here.

Mr. CURTIS. There are two agreements, one with the Cherokees, providing that the application shall have been filed before the 31st day of October, 1902, and the other with the Creeks, that the application shall be filed before the ratification of the agreement.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that that part of the amendment that refers to the agreement between the Indian tribes and the United States, that would bar the enrollment of Cherokee freedmen, filed prior to December 1, 1905, will not prevail. I have an amendment that I shall propose to section 4, covering the case of the Cherokee freedmen who have filed their applications for enrollment prior to the date I have indicated.

Mr. CURTIS. By putting in the word "hereafter," as I have suggested, I think the question of the gentleman is answered and the objection is removed. That will make it read "hereafter filed." By inserting the word "hereafter" and striking out the last line the Secretary is authorized to act upon all applications filed before December 31, 1905.

Mr. MANN. Where does the word "hereafter" come in?

Mr. CURTIS. After the word "to," in line 10.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. So it will read, "Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as to hereafter permit any person," etc. Well, doesn't that still give vitality to the agreement entered into between the Cherokees and the United States which prohibits the enrollment of applicants who did not make their applications prior to December, 1905?

Mr. CURTIS. It would apply to all who had not filed before that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Even with the "hereafter" in?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; in my judgment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I hope the amendment will not prevail, for the reason that there are Cherokee freedmen who did not make their applications prior to that time, but who have made application prior to December 1, 1905, and who, if they were Cherokee freedmen, are justly entitled to enrollment at this time. I sincerely hope that this part of the amendment will not prevail, and I wish that my colleague could see his way clear to so perfect this amendment as to fix the date as of the 1st of December, 1905, for the benefit of these Cherokee freedmen.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if he doesn't think it would be better to strike out the arbitrary date and let all the cases that have been filed be determined before the rolls are closed?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I agree that some time should be fixed for closing up the work of the Commission.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that the 4th of June next is entirely too short a time for the determination of all of these cases? There are thirteen thousand and more applicants.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not referring to the closing up of the rolls; I am referring to the applications for enrollment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is a part of this amendment, however.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman I can not agree with my colleague [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I know of the cases referred to by the gentleman. The act of June 28, 1898, provides that the freedmen referred to by him should be enrolled in accordance with the decision of the Court of Claims. That court decided that the freedmen who were in the Cherokee Nation in 1866, July 19, should be enrolled, or those who voluntarily returned within six months.

Now, in passing upon the Curtis Act, which said that "no person shall be enrolled who has not heretofore removed to and in good faith settled in the nation in which he claimed citizenship," the Department has held that an application filed by freedmen who returned after six months, but who conclusively demonstrated to the Secretary or to the Commission that they were real residents or citizens of the Territory, but were temporarily absent and returned as soon as they could after the treaty of 1866, were entitled to the benefits of the treaty. This is my information. So it seems to me that, having had a decision of the Court of Claims which construed the rights of the Cherokee freedmen under the treaty of 1866, which was rendered in 1896; then having the further notice given in the act of 1896 which required them to file applications within three months; then the Curtis Act which gave them ample notice, and now, after all this, the bill provides for the consideration of all applications filed prior to December 1, 1905, these people have no right to complain, and if they have slept upon their rights I do not think we should open up the rolls to those who have filed their applications since December 1, 1905.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it does not occur to me that Congress should be bound in its legislation by the construction the Supreme Court has put upon legislation heretofore enacted. There were Cherokee freedmen in the Cherokee Nation in the spring of 1866 who found it a very unhealthy place in which to remain. They were absolutely forced out of the Territory.

Mr. PALMER. What are Cherokee freedmen?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They were slaves who had been held in bondage by the Cherokee Indians, and they were freed by proclamation.

Mr. PALMER. What rights have they got?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Under the treaty of 1866 they are entitled to allotment the same as the Indians. But, as I say, in the spring of 1866 these freedmen found it necessary to leave the Territory. Some of them were taken out of the Territory and into New Mexico. They were ignorant, and their children were ignorant. They never heard of the Curtis Act. They did not read the decisions of the Supreme Court construing the act of 1896. They knew nothing that had occurred affecting their rights under the treaty of 1866. Those who were old enough did know that the Cherokee Nation was an unhealthy place for them in the spring of 1866, and they left there, and those who had children took them with them.

Some of them have now returned; they have become citizens there, and they have filed their applications for citizenship, but because of a provision in the constitution of the Cherokee Nation making their enrollment prohibitory the Commission has refused to enroll them, for the reason that they had abandoned their citizenship in the Cherokee Nation. My contention is that the resolution which I have prepared, and which I will now read, ought to be adopted for the purpose of protecting these freedmen and their children:

Provided, That the roll of Cherokee freedmen shall include the names of all such persons as are mentioned in article 9 of the Cherokee treaty of July 19, 1866, who made application for such enrollment on or prior to December 1, 1905, who were taken from the nation or driven therefrom under circumstances which were beyond their control, and who did not, subsequent to August 11, 1866, make application for citizenship in any other tribe.

I am referring to men who made no application for citizenship in any other tribe in the Indian Territory; who made no application to go upon the rolls of any other nation in the Indian Territory.

Mr. PALMER. Have not these people ever had a chance to become enrolled?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They have been barred from being enrolled by a provision in the constitution of the Cherokee Nation which prohibits the enrollment of those who left the Cherokee Nation and became citizens elsewhere.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me state that over 4,000 of the freedmen have been placed on the Cherokee rolls.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But those 4,000 probably are those who did not leave the nation in 1866.

Mr. PALMER. And your object is to give these people who were driven away, or who found the climate too unhealthy and have since come back and found it healthy, a chance to be enrolled.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is it exactly.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what possible objection there is to that.

Mr. CURTIS. We have given the freedmen a chance to be enrolled since 1896. They have gone there by the thousand and filed application. Their rights have been looked into by several commissions appointed for that purpose, and under this bill those who filed their applications prior to December 1, 1905, have the right now to have their applications considered by the Department, and I do not feel that it is proper to open the rolls to those who have not already filed their applications.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas to the committee amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment as amended will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after "enrollment," in line 11, and including the rest of that paragraph.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, after the word "enrollment," in line 11, the rest of paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas) there were—ayes 7, noes 17.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Texas if he desires to renew his motion which the Chair did not entertain a moment ago?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do. I move to strike out now that part of the section beginning after the word "allotment" down to the word "date," in line 9.

Mr. CURTIS. That amendment has been covered, has it not, by the vote which has just been taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 5 to 9, inclusive, strike out "Provided, That the rolls of the tribes affected by this act shall be fully completed on or before the 4th day of June, 1906, and the Secretary of the Interior shall have no jurisdiction to approve the enrollment of any person after said date."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That, Mr. Chairman, is the amendment I have been arguing all the while that should be stricken out, and I hope the House will strike it out. Unless it does, these thirteen thousand who are on the way to the Supreme Court, or rather many of them are, and whose cases are pending before the Commissioner and Secretary of the Interior, will be absolutely cut out of enrollment and lose everything that they have there, while there are 6,000,000 acres of land that will be allotted to these Indians, and I see no reason why they should not be enrolled. These people are prosecuting their cases and endeavoring to get their names on these rolls. I see no reason for this great rush to close the rolls on the 4th of June. These people have spent time and money for years in this, and I think they should have the right to prove their right to citizenship without setting up any arbitrary date.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will be voted down. There are only 5,000 applications now pending. I have the report to the 1st of December, and they can be all acted upon within the time fixed by this bill, and if the House ever expects to close these rolls it should vote for the bill as it is.

Mr. REID. Have these applications been made to the Dawes Commission?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. These applications are pending before the Dawes Commission and before the Secretary of the Interior, including two thousand who have been made citizens by the United States courts of the Indian Territory whose citizenship was set aside by a court appointed or recently made by the United States known as the "citizenship court," and some of these cases are now on the way to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it will be impossible to try these cases and determine the rights of these parties before June the 4th, and if we set up this arbitrary time of June the 4th these parties will not be able to prove their cases.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if he does not know that the law which created the citizenship court provided that the decision of the citizenship court should be final and these people have nothing pending.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is true; but Congress passed an act creating a special court for the purpose of setting aside the judgments of individuals who have vested rights in any matter, and that is the question that they are now seeking to carry to the Supreme Court of the United States—how it will deprive the rights of more than 2,000 people, who hold valid existing outstanding judgments showing that they were citizens of the Indian Territory, by a court created by Congress. Now, these parties contend that that act was unconstitutional, and, once having been enrolled according to the act of Congress, that they could not be taken off the rolls arbitrarily, as was done by the court of citizenship.

Mr. CURTIS. Ninety per cent of whom were enrolled by fraud.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is very well for the gentleman to say that, and I asked him the question a while ago, what would become of the other 10 per cent that he proposes to disfranchise and take the law away from?

Mr. REID. The gentleman speaks of their not having a day in court. If their applications had not been thrashed out here for——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They were thrashed out and obtained favorably judgment, and then this court was appointed by act of Congress to determine whether these judgments were valid, and they set them aside en bloc. The whole business was set aside upon two questions of law, and now they are seeking to revise these decisions and see whether or not these parties do not still own their property in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman's idea is to fix the date at some more distant time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. My idea is that all of these cases should have their day in court in order to be heard, and that an arbitrary date should not be fixed beyond which they can not be heard.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not practicable to fix a date at some future time, allowing them an opportunity to have their causes determined?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would be perfectly willing to fix a reasonable time, but I think the 4th of March of this year is unreasonable.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is unreasonable.

Mr. LACEY. All of these men have had their day in court. There was so much fraud in the original transaction that Congress made a provision for a retrial or reexamination of these fraudulent cases, and on a retrial a certain proportion of them—I do not remember the exact number, but a very considerable part of them—were thrown out. They have had their day in court and the rolls have been purged. Now the purpose is to extend this time in the hope or under the suggestion that perhaps Congress may pass another act authorizing an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the court annulling these judgments of citizenship. It is an old matter. It has been thrashed out in the House and Senate committees of this Congress for a number of years, but it is now finally closed. There is no court that they can go to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that my understanding of the statement of my colleague was that these people had been given certain rights, possibly that of citizenship, by Congress; that they had acquired vested rights.

Mr. LACEY. No; fraudulent decrees, giving them rights which have subsequently been set aside by the Congress, and are now absolutely outside of the rolls, with no power to get on the rolls.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that what the gentleman from Texas says were "vested rights" have been declared not to have been rights?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. What cases are pending in the Supreme Court?

Mr. LACEY. None of these claims whatever.

Mr. PALMER. I understood the gentleman to say there were cases in the Supreme Court.

Mr. CURTIS. There are the cases of 1,587 intermarried white citizens of the Cherokee Nation now pending in the Supreme Court.

Mr. LACEY. But not the class of claims referred to by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose that by the time fixed in this bill the decision has not been rendered, what are you going to do? Are you going to get the people off because the Supreme Court has not decided their cases?

Mr. CURTIS. Not at all. I am advised they will be decided in February or March, and then provision will be made for these 1,587 intermarried whites. I also stated further that there was a proposition now pending between the parties to settle the rights, or, I mean, the controversy, of these intermarried whites.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What will be the result, if the gentleman will answer the question, if the Supreme Court should reverse these cases and order a new trial? How would it be possible for a new trial to be had if their rights had been fixed before the 4th of June?

Mr. CURTIS. As I said before, if the case is determined before that time there will be no trouble in having arrangements made for the enrollment for 1,587 intermarried whites. They probably will not order a new trial. It is simply a question of the construction of a treaty, and the decision will be final one way or the other, either that they are entitled to enrollment under that treaty or that they are not entitled to enrollment under it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why would it not be better to just simply state that the rights of these individuals shall be determined? Why not give them that right?

Mr. CURTIS. It has been passed upon by the Commission, passed upon by the Secretary, and by the Court of Claims, and all decided against these gentlemen. The question is now pending in the Supreme Court, and a decision is expected in a short time.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose that the Supreme Court decided they had the right to be enrolled and they appealed later, then, with this bill passed fixing the time, when they went to the Supreme Court they would be met by the act of Congress saying that they could not make the application.

Mr. CURTIS. I have already said that if the question is not decided by that time I would be willing that the bill should be amended before it is finally passed. That would take care of the rights of these intermarried whites.

Mr. PALMER. Then all this would be dependent upon the decision. If the Supreme Court decided one way it would be a good law, and if they decided another it is a bad one.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman if we are not taking a chance by passing this law and leaving it to the other body to remedy the wrong that we have done?

Mr. CURTIS. The Supreme Court will carry out the provisions of that treaty.

Mr. PADGETT. Suppose the Supreme Court decides the other way?

Mr. CURTIS. As I have already said, if it does decide the other way, then provision can be made to meet it. The decision will be made before the term set in this bill expires.

Mr. PADGETT. Will you guarantee that?

Mr. CURTIS. If the decision is not made before this bill passes in the Senate, provision will be made for it.

Mr. PADGETT. How do you know?

Mr. CURTIS. I guess this House will have something to say about the passage of this bill.

Mr. PADGETT. But after we pass it, it will go to another body.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will informally rise.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to give notice that I desire to take this bill up to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES OF INDIANS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Texas. We are entirely in good faith, and I will add to this amendment the following:

Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites of the Cherokee applicants whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why not make it all tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. Because the gentleman from Texas knows just as well as I do that it is the intention to open up this question indefinitely for people whose cases have been finally settled, who have had full opportunities to present their claims in court, and who have no right to go there.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why, if you give the Cherokees that, will you not extend it to the other four tribes? Why not treat all of the tribes alike?

Mr. CURTIS. Because they are the only ones that have cases pending in the Supreme Court.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I shall not object to the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer that amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman merely to give notice that he will offer this amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to offer it now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection. It will better the bill to some extent.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. CURTIS. Let us vote that amendment down, and then I shall offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment at the end of the amendment that was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section insert: "Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to the intermarried whites in the Cherokee Nation whose cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the principal chiefs of the Choctaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, and the governor of the Chickasaw tribe, recognized by the Secretary of the Interior at the time of the dissolution of the tribal governments, are hereby continued in office for the purpose of executing patents, deeds, and other conveyances affecting lands belonging to said tribes, respectively, and to represent the tribes in such matters as may be referred to them by the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay said executives, from the funds of the tribes, the salaries now prescribed by tribal laws, and such necessary traveling and incidental expenses, including clerical assistance, as he may approve, and such services shall continue until all deeds or patents to allottees shall be executed.

If any such executive shall refuse or neglect to perform the duties devolving upon him, he may be removed from office by the Secretary of the Interior, or if any such executive become permanently disabled the office may be declared vacant by the Secretary of the Interior, who may fill any vacancy arising from removal, disability, or death of the incumbent by appointment of a citizen by blood of the tribe.

If any such executive shall fail, refuse, or neglect, for thirty days after notice, that any instrument is ready for his signature, to appear at a place to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior and execute the same, such instrument may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior without such execution, and when so approved and recorded shall convey legal title.

The Secretary of the Interior may, upon the recommendation of the executives of the respective tribes, employ legal counsel for said tribes, and he shall fix the compensation to be paid such counsel and permit the employment of necessary clerical assistance and the payment of traveling and incidental expenses, including witness and marshal fees, and all expenditures hereunder shall be paid upon order of the Secretary of the Interior out of any funds of said tribes, respectively.

Should either of said executives fail to recommend a competent person for employment as counsel within such time as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, said Secretary may employ such counsel as he may deem necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 6, page 6, by striking out all after the word "title," in line 13, down to the end of said section.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the object of that is to strike out the portion of this section providing that the Secretary of the Interior may, upon the recommendation of the executives of the respective tribes, employ legal counsel for said tribes. That means on the recommendation of the chiefs and governors of those tribes.

And he shall fix the compensation to be paid such counsel.

I do not understand the reason of this language:

The Secretary of the Interior may, upon the recommendation of the executives of the respective tribes, employ legal counsel for said tribes.

Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Interior has legal counsel in his Department whom he can send down there for the purpose of defending whatever rights these Indians may have against outsiders?

Mr. CURTIS. The Secretary of the Interior has no counsel that he can send to the Territory. He must call upon the Department of Justice, and in several cases where they have had suits pending it has been necessary to delegate special counsel, and it has been more expensive than it would have been for the Government to employ an attorney by the year.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that under the wording of this bill here the Secretary could not employ anyone unless these executive officers of these respective tribes should point out a particular man? Is it not a fact that the Secretary has no discretion at all?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I think it leaves it in his hands. If they do not recommend some one who is agreeable to him, he has a right to employ such counsel as he desires to do their legal work.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that there is a great scandal down in that country with reference to this matter?

Mr. CURTIS. I do know that there was an act passed, and I want to say to the gentleman that this provision of the bill was put in to shut that matter out and leave it in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, instead of in the hands of the chiefs of the nations, so that there could be no fraud or scandal about it. That is why this section was drawn.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why not strike out these words then?

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing, but it is their property, and as long as they are willing to do what is fair and right they should have a right to recommend to the Secretary of the Interior the counsel whom they desire. He does not have to employ the man they recommend unless he sees fit to do so. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection, but I think they have a right to be represented.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not D. H. Johnson one of the executive officers of these tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. I think so.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And P. S. Moseley has been, has he not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Are not the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish the representatives of some of these tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. They are the attorneys under contract with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, but their employment ceases on the 4th of March, 1906.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that at the May term, 1905, of the United States court for the southern district of the Indian Territory, sitting at Ardmore, the grand jury found an indictment against all these men, charging them with conspiring against the Indian tribes, for converting a great amount of funds to their use and benefit?

Mr. CURTIS. I know it just as the gentleman from Texas knows it. I read it in the newspapers, but that has nothing to do with the provision of this section, which was put in there at the request of the Department, so as to prevent any scandal or fraud in the future in the employment of counsel for the Indian tribes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. One of these very men is to suggest counsel—one of these men who has been indicted for conspiracy. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to leave it in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to employ competent counsel here in Washington? They have a legal department in the Interior, have they not?

Mr. CURTIS. If the gentleman will read the last part of the section, he will see that the Secretary has the right to act:

Should either of said executives fail to recommend a competent person for employment as counsel within such time as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, said Secretary may employ such counsel as he may deem necessary.

This seems to me to give ample protection, and, as I said to the gentleman a minute ago, if this committee thinks it best that these tribes shall have nothing to say about who shall be employed or shall not be consulted, it is perfectly satisfactory to me. I do not care whom they employ or who employs them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would it not obviate the objection of the gentleman from Texas if you inserted after the word "competent" the word "satisfactory?"

Mr. CURTIS. I will consent to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York, to insert the word "satisfactory" after the word "competent," in line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23, after the word "competent" insert the words "and satisfactory."

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Kansas is to perfect the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas how much money was paid counsel in some cases?

Mr. CURTIS. I understand in the citizenship case it was left to be determined by the citizenship court, and after a hearing, all of which was in open court, they fixed the fee in those cases at $750,000.

Mr. MANN. The Indian court?

Mr. CURTIS. No; not the Indian court, but a citizenship court, a court appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, consisting of three judges.

Mr. MANN. Who were those judges?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not say, but I will refer you to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. REID. I do not recall their names; they were from three different parts of the country. I was about to add this to what the gentleman from Kansas has said, that the fee as fixed was not so much as the contract required. The question arose in the citizenship court, and the citizenship court was given jurisdiction to investigate it and fix it. Their contract gave them a certain percentage of the amount saved to the Indian tribes. They saved a very large amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. Fifteen million dollars.

Mr. REID. And they did a great deal of work.

Mr. MANN. There are many ways of robbing the Indians, and I suppose a contingent fee is one of the slickest.

Mr. REID. I do not know anything about it——

Mr. MANN. I do not mean to say that there was any robbery in this case.

Mr. REID. I am sure there was not. I know these gentlemen, and they took proofs all over the South and saved the Indians a very large amount of money.

Mr. MANN. Who appointed the attorneys in that case?

Mr. CURTIS. The Indians themselves.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman answer this question: Isn't it a fact that the legislative bodies in the last few months passed an act giving 10 per cent of all money derived from the sale of the lands, the lands that you are providing for selling now?

Mr. CURTIS. That is true, and those acts must be approved by the President of the United States. They have not been approved. I was informed that they had been disapproved, but not by the President. I have not talked with him about it, but I wish the gentleman from Texas to bear in mind that this section was prepared by the Department to shut out these kinds of contracts and leave the matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LACEY. Why not take it out of the hands of these gentlemen? You leave it here for them to dictate.

Mr. MANN. Whatever the facts may be about the services rendered by these people, whether they rendered services under a contingent contract or not, I do not believe there is a Member in this House or a person in Washington who does not know that the payment of $750,000 out of the money due to these Indians for services rendered in saving money from the Government was exorbitant.

Mr. CURTIS. It was not saving the money from the Government. It was for saving money and property that would have gone to those who had secured enrollment by fraud—man, woman, and child who had been fraudulently placed upon the rolls of the tribes and would have been given property of the value of $15,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Under acts of Congress?

Mr. CURTIS. By fraudulent enrollment, and not by complying with the acts of Congress at all.

Mr. MANN. Under acts of Congress—saving these Indians money which they were liable to lose under acts of Congress either through faulty legislation or otherwise, possibly through the faultiness of human nature.

Mr. CURTIS. Not faulty legislation.

Mr. MANN. In any event, whatever it was under, it was not for services. It was highway robbery when these men were paid $750,000, and the gentleman believes it, although he can not very well say so probably at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman may characterize the fee as he pleases; that is not a question for me to pass upon. But I want to say that those men and women and children were added to the rolls, not by any error in the law, not by any fraudulent Government official, but by reason of fraudulent officers, commissioners, and referees and perjured witnesses that were used in the Indian Territory, and by using in some cases notary seals for persons who had never been notaries, and other fraudulent acts too numerous to mention.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer just a word to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. These fraudulent citizens have got upon the rolls. There was a contract made with certain attorneys to try and get them off the rolls. That contract provided a contingent fee. The percentage for that work was a certain per cent of the value of that citizenship right. As they were excluded—a large number were—the amounts were added together, and it made a very large fee. The amount was so extravagant that the Secretary of the Interior absolutely refused to pay—refused to approve of the contract at all giving the large sum that they would be entitled to as a contingent fee. Subsequently it was referred to a court to determine what the amount should be. The amount allowed, it seems to me, was excessive for the work done. Of course, it was inside the contract. The Secretary of the Interior made every effort to prevent it being paid through the courts, but finally it had to be paid. However, the amount was very much less than the contract which the attorneys had called for.

It seems to me, and I agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the claim was an excessive allowance and more than the services could have been worth. These men, however, did render good service and successful service, but $750,000 was an excessive allowance, but it could not be avoided because it was allowed by the court.

Mr. CURTIS. The officers of the Department had nothing to do with that.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; and it was not an act of Congress, as my friend suggests. These citizens either had rights on the roll or had not rights. The question was as to whether these men were citizens or not, and it was not a faulty act of Congress. It was a claim of bogus citizens trying to get on the rolls, and it took a fight to keep them off and it cost something to keep them off, but it cost more than it ought to have cost.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What would the attorneys have gotten if they had kept nobody off?

Mr. LACEY. The attorneys would have gotten nothing.

Mr. MANN. The attorneys, if they kept nobody off, would have been paid for their services, as they are always in such cases where they deal with anything in the way of a corporate body.

Mr. LACEY. Their contract was a contingent fee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Was the gentleman aware of the fact that a great many were kept off the rolls who were entitled to be on the rolls?

Mr. LACEY. And my friend from Texas thinks we ought to extend the time and let them get back on again, and it would probably require another contingent fee to get them off and keep them off.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman this question: Is it not a fact, in the rolls now where Indians have allotments, that sometimes a husband is on the roll and his wife is off the roll, and that a father is on the roll and his children are off—that there are numerous cases of that kind?

Mr. LACEY. I have no doubt in this vast multitude of cases some injustice has been done. It cost us $750,000 of good money to purge these rolls, and my friend thinks we ought to pass a law by which they would still have a further chance to try to get back again. I do not think so. There may be some women and children excluded who ought to be on this roll, but——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the payment of that $750,000 is the greatest outrage I ever heard of.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to assume control and direction of the schools in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, with the lands and all school property pertaining thereto, March 5, 1906, and to conduct such schools under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, retaining the present system so far as practicable, until such time as a public school system shall have been established under Territorial or State government, and proper provision made thereunder for the education of the Indian children of said tribes, and he is hereby authorized and directed to set aside a sufficient amount of any funds, invested or otherwise, in the Treasury of the United States, belonging to said tribes, including the royalties on coal and asphalt in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, to defray all the necessary expenses of said schools, using, however, only such portion of said funds of each tribe as may be requisite for the schools of that tribe, not exceeding in any one year for the respective tribes the amount expended for the scholastic year ending June 30, 1905; and he is further authorized and directed to use the remainder, if any, of the funds appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, "for the maintenance, strengthening, and enlarging of the tribal schools of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole nations," unexpended March 4, 1906, including such fees as have accrued or may hereafter accrue under the act of Congress approved February 19, 1903, Statutes at Large, volume 32, page 841, which fees are hereby appropriated, in continuing such schools as may have been established, and in establishing such new schools as he may direct, and any of the tribal funds so set aside remaining unexpended when a public school system under a future State or Territorial government has been established shall be distributed per capita among the citizens of the nations, in the same manner as other funds.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that section also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 8, after the word "aside," add the following: "All of the coal and asphalt land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations;" and after the word "asphalt," in line 11, add the word "lands;" and after the word "the," in said line, add the word "said."

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to have the gentleman explain that amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, beginning at the end of line 5, it would read this way:

And proper provision made thereunder for the education of the Indian children of said tribe, and he is hereby authorized and directed to set aside all segregated coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations and a sufficient amount of any fund, invested or otherwise, in the Treasury of the United States, belonging to said tribe, including the royalties on coal and asphalt land in the said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

My idea about that is this, Mr. Chairman: The great trouble about creating a new State, which I hope will be done in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma, is the fact that the Indians have no school funds. They have 400,000 acres of these segregated coal lands, the best coal in the entire Southwest. If we preserve these lands as a school fund, then it will more than equalize the amount of land that Oklahoma now has of school lands, and those two Territories will come in on an equality as far as schools are concerned. If we permit them to sell their lands, as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas in the bill—and I am glad it is stricken out—if those lands should be sold, then the Indians will come in as a burden to the future State of Oklahoma instead of a benefit to it. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but it would be of benefit to the States of Texas, Kansas, Arkansas, and Oklahoma that these lands be leased instead of sold in a large body.

If these lands are sold in large bodies, as proposed, a few men, probably a half a dozen, will buy up these 400,000 acres of land, they will run railroads through them, and they will create a monopoly, and they will hold the entire southwestern country by the throat in a coal trust such as is known in the Eastern States here. They will be parallel. Now, understand, that if these school lands are reserved for a school fund, and we lease them and take the royalty on these lands from year to year, we will have a school fund that will more than educate the Indians. I do not propose to take the land away from the Indians, but that the land shall be segregated from the coal and asphalt to be sold separately for agricultural or any other purpose, and that the asphalt and coal deposit shall be kept as a permanent school fund on the royalty basis. I will further state that at the present time probably 100,000 acres of this land is already leased.

Mr. CURTIS. One hundred and eighty thousand.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman from Kansas inform me of the amount of money that is being derived now from these royalties?

Mr. CURTIS. It was $248,000 last year.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars from 180,000 acres of land. Take the same amount and these Indians would secure a magnificent amount of money from year to year. It would greatly benefit them as an educational fund; when if we divided it up and let them have their money at the present time, and sell this land, and let it go into the hands of a coal trust, as I apprehend it will do, we then will not be in the position to equalize the conditions between Indian Territory and Oklahoma. And they should be equalized when we make a State out of this great Commonwealth, which I hope this Congress will do before adjournment. [Applause.]

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will be voted down, and for this reason: We provide in this bill for a continuation of the school system in the Indian Territory at the expense of the Indian tribes until the State or Territory is organized. Last year there were four hundred and odd thousand dollars of the Indians' money used for the purpose of maintaining schools. Now, in the statehood bill we set aside $5,000,000 in cash and give it to the new State of Oklahoma in lieu of the land that it would naturally receive for school purposes if land had been set aside—the proper sections had been set aside—in the Indian Territory proper. So they get $5,000,000 in lieu of the land, and get it from the Government to offset the land, or in place of the land they would have received had it been owned by the Government instead of by the Indians. Now, it would not be fair to the Indians, in the face of the agreement we have made with them, to take this money of theirs that we have agreed to divide between them and create a school fund when the Government has already provided, or will provide in the statehood bill, a school fund of $5,000,000 for the Indian Territory. We provide in this bill a continuance of the present schools, at a cost of over $500,000 in the Indian Territory a year, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. What objection is there to saving this land which belongs to these Indians for school purposes? You say that in the statehood bill it is proposed to give the State of Oklahoma $5,000,000 in money in lieu of the land which otherwise would be reserved for school purposes?

Mr. CURTIS. If it had been an ordinary Territory, and if the Government had owned——

Mr. PALMER. What earthly objection can there be to saving these valuable lands—the asphalt and mineral lands—and reserving the rents of those lands for an everlasting school fund for the benefit of the children of that Territory? And why is it not better than to sell the land to speculators, either in patches of 160 acres or in patches of 100,000 acres, or in any other way?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not agree with the gentleman that the land will be sold to speculators. But the reason we should not use the money of the Indians and these coal lands is this: We have already agreed with the Indians to sell the coal lands and divide the money among the members of the tribes. And it was generally understood that when the tribal governments expired the new government would maintain the schools in the new State or Territory.

Mr. PALMER. You are leasing these lands now, as I understand, and the money is appropriated to school purposes. Why not let it go on?

Mr. CURTIS. Not now. They are to use it for any purpose. We had provided regular school funds out of which the schools are to be maintained, but there is a tax for school purposes when the Territory is organized, and we provide in this bill for the maintenance of these schools out of their funds until the State or Territory is organized.

Mr. PALMER. All that you get now under the law for these lands is some million dollars in this Indian Territory, which is about enough to run the schools one year, if they are properly run, in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. CURTIS. But Oklahoma has already received a great donation for school purposes, and it was thought that the $5,000,000 cash would be an equivalent to the amount of land that the State should receive from that part known as the Indian Territory; and what right have the people to take the Indian's money and create a school fund for the State, especially when we have agreed with them to sell the property and divide the money among them?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That all coal and asphalt lands and deposits in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, whether leased or unleased, segregated under or the sale of which has been authorized by any act of Congress, shall be sold at public auction under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in bulk or in such parcels as he may determine to be for the best interests of the tribes and under regulations prescribed by him. All expenses, inclusive of necessary clerical assistance in the Department of the Interior, connected with and incident to such sale shall be paid from the funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. Conveyances of lands sold under the provisions of this section shall be executed, recorded, and delivered in like manner and with like effect as herein provided for other conveyances.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 1, after the word "all," insert the word "unleased." In line 2, after the word "nations," strike out the words in lines 2 and 3, "whether leased or unleased."

Mr. LACEY. I offer the following substitute for the committee amendment, being a substitute for the entire section. I want to state here that this is a committee amendment offered by them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. All coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired. And the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease the residue of the unleased coal and asphalt lands for mining purposes under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, such additional leases to be limited in time so as to expire not later than the now expiring leases, and the royalties to be collected and applied by the Secretary of the Interior in the same manner as the royalties under existing leases. That upon the expiration of all such leases all coal and asphalt lands and deposits in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, whether leased or unleased, segregated under or the sale of which has been authorized by any act of Congress, shall be sold at public auction under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in bulk or in such parcels as he may determine to be for the best interests of the tribes and under regulations prescribed by him. All expenses, inclusive of necessary clerical assistance in the Department of the Interior, connected with and incident to such sale shall be paid from the funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. Conveyances of lands sold under the provisions of this section shall be executed, recorded, and delivered in like manner and with like effect as herein provided for other conveyances.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, the situation as to these coal and asphalt leases is somewhat peculiar, and I wish to call the attention of the committee to it. There are about 113 leases, the maximum lease being 960 acres to any one lessee. These leases are now controlled by about 70 operating coal companies or partnerships. The minimum royalty under the leases is about $60,000 per annum. The actual royalty runs somewhere in the neighborhood of from $200,000 to $248,000 per annum. Section 13 as originally drafted authorized the sale of the leased lands, and that sale would carry the leases with it, and thus extinguish this annual income of the Indian tribes. We first proposed to amend it by reserving simply the leased land, so that the Indians would continue to get their royalty from the leased lands and sell the lands unleased. Attention was called by the operators interested in the leases to the fact that if the other lands were sold at anything like the figures of the highest bid heretofore made for the coal lands under sealed bids, they would only bring $7 to $8 an acre; that the new coal operators could buy those lands and practically drive the holders of the leased lands out of business, as they are compelled to pay 8 cents a ton under their leases, and the result would be that the Indians would be cut off from this royalty and the operators who are paying the royalty would be driven out of business.

There were two ways to meet this. One would be to allow the operators under the lease to buy the fee in the lands on which their leases are situated. That, however, might result in disposing of these lands at a great deal less than they, with the lease, would be worth, and we believed that it would have that effect. Another way to protect the Indian was by putting a reservation on the remainder of the coal lands from sale, but permitting them to be leased, the new lease to run no longer than the existing leases on the other lands.

This would prevent the difficulty which the coal lessees are complaining about, and it was concluded when the matter was submitted to the committee this morning that an amendment should be offered withdrawing all the coal and asphalt land, leased or unleased, and allowing the unleased land to be leased on leases not exceeding in time those now in existence, and when the leases run out for all the lands to be disposed of at the same time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not understand that these lands were to be sold.

Mr. LACEY. They are to be sold when the leases expire.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If I had known that I should have opposed this amendment. I do not think we ought to sell the lands; I think we ought to reserve them as a permanent fund.

Mr. LACEY. That would still be in the control of Congress. The leases will run for fifteen or twenty years. The whole matter will be under the control of Congress if it desires to make any change at that time. The original section 13 was drawn because Congress agreed with the Indians that it would sell the lands and give the Indians the money. The substitute would still carry out that arrangement with the Indians, but would postpone it until the expiration of the existing leases. In the meantime the royalties would go to the Indians. If it is found better after a while not to sell the lands, Congress would have it in its control to withdraw them, but this section as now drawn carries out the agreement as heretofore made between the Government of the United States and the Indians.

Mr. PALMER. How many acres are leased?

Mr. LACEY. One hundred and eight thousand acres.

Mr. PALMER. At how much?

Mr. LACEY. Two hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars last year.

Mr. PALMER. How much a ton?

Mr. LACEY. Eight cents.

Mr. PALMER. It seems to me that is a mighty cheap lease.

Mr. LACEY. On the contrary, it is a very high lease. In Iowa much better coal is leased at usually six and a quarter cents a ton. That runs into money very fast. Let me say to the gentleman that the most dangerous mining in the United States to-day in coal mines is in the Indian Territory, on account of the gases and the fact that the coal runs in veins at a great angle. It has to be mined at an angle, and it runs in veins from 4 to 4½ feet. The veins are full of gas, explosions are frequent, and it requires great effort both on the part of miners and operators to protect life. So at 8 cents a ton for coal under these circumstances, with the difficulties that they have to contend with, is certainly a very fair price, in my judgment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question which is not relevant here, but as he is always ready to answer questions I may get the information. In what way can we get money to educate the white children in the Indian Territory?

Mr. LACEY. By an appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I have a bill here appropriating $250,000.

Mr. CURTIS. We made an appropriation last year providing for the use of certain moneys for that purpose, and it has not all been expended yet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that in the towns they have plenty of money, but there are many white children in the country, and the money will be exhausted by the 1st of March. I have a letter here from a young lady who went from my State out there to teach school, a very estimable young woman, and she says that the money to educate the white children will run out by the 1st of March.

Mr. CURTIS. I think she must be mistaken.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is really a great hardship and outrage to have 300,000 or 400,000 white children grow up down there in absolute ignorance.

Mr. LACEY. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri on that question. Congress attempted to meet it by making a liberal appropriation last year and undoubtedly will do so again; but that is not involved in the question we have here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that; I did not ask it as having anything to do with this.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question in my time. Under this proposed amendment there is to be a continuance of the leases, and how is the money to be distributed?

Mr. LACEY. This money goes into the tribal fund; they already have a large fund.

Mr. MANN. How long do the tribal relations continue?

Mr. LACEY. We propose to end them on the 4th of March.

Mr. MANN. Then how is the money to be distributed?

Mr. LACEY. To individual members of the tribe by the Government officials—Secretary of the Interior or the Indian Bureau.

Mr. MANN. And the Government has to keep track of all the descendants of these people for time immemorial?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; the rolls are made up, and that is the reason why the gentleman from Kansas and others have been so anxious to close the rolls.

Mr. MANN. Supposing the rolls are all made up and a man dies, who gets his money?

Mr. LACEY. His heirs.

Mr. MANN. Then the Government has to keep track of these matters?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How long?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, they keep track of them themselves.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the Government has to do it.

Mr. LACEY. I know, but the party the money is coming to will put in his claim and furnish the necessary proof, and the Government will have to administer upon these assets in that way until the money is finally distributed.

Mr. MANN. How long is this to continue?

Mr. LACEY. Until the money is all paid out.

Mr. MANN. Is there any arrangement when it is to end?

Mr. LACEY. No definite arrangement. That is the trouble about the amendment I now offer. It will necessarily delay that final distribution, but the reason why we take this view is because there will be so much more money coming to the Indians by that method than by immediately putting the property into the market and disbursing it.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention as soon as possible to pay these Indians all that is due them?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And get rid of all this?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; that is the intention, and but for this amendment I sincerely believe the whole matter could be arranged within the next two years. I hope some arrangement will be made to sell this land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask whether this would be the proper time to move to strike out the last part of that amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]—whether it is divisible?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean the latter part of the section?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The latter part of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the motion would recur first upon the committee amendment to the section, and then a motion to strike out a part of the substitue would be in order before the vote would be taken upon the substitute itself.

The question is upon the committee amendment to the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that part of the substitute providing for the sale of this land—the last few lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following: "All coal and asphalt lands and deposits in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, whether now leased or unleased, segregated under or the sale of which has been authorized by any act of Congress, shall be sold at public auction under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in bulk or in such parcels as he may determine to be for the best interests of the tribes and under regulations prescribed by him. All expenses, inclusive of necessary clerical assistance in the Department of the Interior, connected with and incident to such sale shall be paid from the funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. Conveyance of lands sold under the provisions of this section shall be executed, recorded, and delivered in like manner and with like effect as herein provided for other conveyances."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that portion of this amendment going out, because it does not take effect for a good many years in the future. If this stays in, no further legislation will be needed. If it is stricken out, Congress will be compelled to act in the future. It is not very material whether it stays in or goes out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to strike out the language just read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That when allotments as provided by this and other acts of Congress have been made to all members and freedmen of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, the residue of lands in each of said nations not reserved or otherwise disposed of shall be sold by the Secretary of the Interior under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him and the proceeds of such sales deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the respective tribes. Conveyances of land sold under the provisions of this section shall be executed, recorded, and delivered in like manner and with like effect as herein provided for other conveyances.

With the following committee amendment:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be permitted to sell to any association or person 100,000 acres of land, not valuable for agricultural, mineral, or timber purposes, at not less than its appraised value, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to be reserved for a game preserve only.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, to carry out an arrangement made with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCNARY], I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 16, on page 16, after the words "game preserve only," the following:

"Provided further, That if any association or person so purchasing 100,000 acres of land for a game preserve only shall not maintain it as a game preserve only such land shall revert to the United States, or if the Territory in which such land is situated shall be included in any State of the Union such land shall revert to such State and shall be used for the benefit of the school fund of such State."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the question has not been put upon the original amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the amendment which I agreed to offer during the general debate with Mr. MCNARY. If the gentleman prefers to vote for the amendment first, I think we can perfect the item and then vote upon it. I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to know, whether the amendment is an amendment to the amendment or an amendment to the section. I would like to suggest that in his amendment where he says "game reserve" that he say "game reserve only," as he says in the original amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that word will be inserted at the proper place.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose to permit the sale of more than one tract as a game reserve?

Mr. CURTIS. There was only one tract suggested to the committee. It came in just before the bill was reported, and because of the nature of the land the committee had no objection to allowing the Secretary to sell that amount if he thought it a good thing to do. The committee heard of but one organization, and it worded the amendment in general terms, so that if the Secretary thought best he might sell to any person who might apply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman favored the sale of more than one tract of 100,000 acres as a game reserve?

Mr. CURTIS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman favor the sale of more than one tract?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think but one tract will be sold, and in my judgment that is all that should be sold.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I call the attention of the gentleman to the language of this amendment, which is:

That the Secretary of the Interior be permitted to sell to any association or person—

Suppose several people applied?

Mr. CURTIS. In order to limit the matter, I am willing to consent to an amendment in line 24, after the word "person," and say "one person only of."

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would make only one tract possible to be bought?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in the effort to get this 100,000 acres of land for some particular corporation, the gentleman, whom I know would not do a thing that affected the public domain injuriously in his opinion, is willing to concede almost any amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. MANN. The proposition is so vicious itself. Here the Government proposes, having adopted a policy for years through all of its life to not give to some particular individual or corporation a large part of the public domain—now you propose to give to one person 100,000 acres. For what? For a game reserve, and the gentleman says it ought to be limited to one person, because the land is worth nothing for anything else. I do not know whether they will strike oil on this land, and neither does the gentleman. Nobody knows what the land may be worth. Everybody knows that land in that portion of the country has immensely increased in value for various things, particularly oil and gas.

Mr. CURTIS. Not in this section.

Mr. MANN. In that section of the country, not in this locality. The gentleman makes a distinction between a section of the country which did not occur to me.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What is the reason of giving this tract of land to any one person?

Mr. MANN. I can see no reason for giving this tract of land in the shape of 100,000 acres of land to anybody. I think it is against the policy of the country to sell tracts of land to the extent of 100,000 acres to one person. It is contrary to every principle that we have indulged in in the distribution of the public domain.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman right there.

Mr. MANN. I am glad to be interrupted by the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS. And to state that the gentleman misstates my position in this matter. I do not care anything about this amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Then let us vote it out.

Mr. MANN. I thought myself the gentleman did not. I give the gentleman credit for being one of the best defenders of the public domain who ever came in this House, and I did not believe the gentleman cared whether the amendment stays in the bill or not. It is a vicious amendment and it should be voted out. Why should we give 100,000 acres of land to one person and not to another. Why should we make a game reserve in the Indian Territory and not in Dakota? Who knows what the land may be worth in the future for some purpose, a tract of land 6 miles wide and 25 miles long, and who knows how it may interfere with the rest of the land in that locality? There is no excuse for it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to state to the gentleman that this bill now permits the Secretary to sell it all, the 6,000,000 of acres, which I believe there is there, and I think this 100,000 acres is rather of a limitation. That is what I have been fighting for all day.

Mr. MANN. If it be true, as the gentleman from Texas suggests, that under this bill the Secretary of the Interior could sell the entire 6,000,000 acres of land to one person or to one corporation, the bill ought not to pass. I do not believe the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] would bring a bill into this House that would permit any officer of the Government to sell 6,000,000 acres of land to one corporation or one person.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to suggest to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I have prepared an amendment to meet this, as follows:

Provided further, That agricultural lands shall be sold in tracts of not exceeding 160 acres to any one person.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. While the gentleman is discussing that proposition, might it not be well to suggest that it be set aside as a forest reserve instead of as a game reserve?

Mr. MANN. If it is to be preserved as a game reserve the Government ought to buy it from the Indians and preserve it as a reserve for the Indians. It is a vicious proposition to say that the Government shall start in to permit individuals to own game preserves of 100,000 acres of land in this country. We will have the same proposition coming from the Rocky Mountains, or wherever else we have Government lands. A few years ago we passed an act here to give to the people of Nebraska the right to purchase 640 acres of land instead of 160 acres of land. I do not know whether it was proper or not, or whether it has worked advantageously or not. I know that Congress has been severely criticised for it, and it has been stated that it does not work well.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What consideration, if my friend will answer the question, is to be paid for this special privilege?

Mr. MANN. Whatever the man who is willing to buy it will pay for it.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no; at not less than its appraised value, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary will prescribe.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is the same thing. The gentleman himself says it is worth nothing. What appraised value will it have? If it is worth nothing, what appraised value has it? The appraiser will report that it is valueless. It remains to see what the gentleman is willing to pay for it. Who desires to start the Government upon the policy of inaugurating private game preserves? Why, there are plenty of millionaires in this country who will be glad if the Government enters upon a project which finds so much favor on the other side of the ocean—that of private game preserves—either at the expense of the Indians or the Government. It is a policy that ought not to be undertaken. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is proper, and the other ought not to be adopted.

Mr. CURTIS. I think it only fair to the committee to say that when this bill was up, and just before it was reported, this matter was presented. The resolutions of the Choctaw and Chickasaw legislatures, as I remember it, were presented, asking for this legislation. Members of the committee had no particular interest in it. They knew that there were millions of acres of land in that country which were valueless, or are supposed at this time to be valueless, for agricultural, grazing, timber, or mineral purposes, and they saw no objections to putting the provision in and letting the House take such action as it saw fit. The Indians themselves have asked for it, and the land is theirs to be disposed of. We put the provision in that it should be sold by the Secretary of the Interior, under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, because we knew that he would protect the interests of the Indians.

A good deal of objection has been urged against this bill because we have left so much in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. I believe I know the Secretary of the Interior as well as any member of this body, and I can say here that in all my experience with the Secretary of the Interior I have always found him anxious to protect the interests of the Indians of this country. And, so far as I am concerned, I am not afraid to leave this matter in his hands.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do you not think that it is a very improper precedent to confer upon these lordly or ducal people, whoever they may be, the special privilege of owning this property, a privilege that is not given to other people?

Mr. CURTIS. As I said to the gentleman from Illinois, so far as I am concerned I do not care anything about this amendment, but I think the House ought to act upon it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would not that policy be more fitting to the monarchial governments of Europe than to this country?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not have that understanding of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kansas whether he believes that without this provision in the bill the present Secretary of the Interior would sell 100,000 acres to any person or association?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not believe he would for that or for any other purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And does not the gentleman believe that carrying that provision in the bill would in effect compel him to do that?

Mr. CURTIS. No; it simply permits him if he so desires.

Mr. MANN. He will take it as a command.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He would not do it unless Congress should indicate its consent.

Mr. CURTIS. I rather think he would not sell it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. At whose suggestion did that provision go into the bill? I am sorry I did not hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. CURTIS. The chiefs of the two nations that own the land sent us a resolution of the legislatures, asking that these lands be sold, naming the person to whom it was to be sold, or the organization; and the committee acting upon it struck out that part of it and provided that the Secretary might sell to any person or association.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I did not desire to have anything to say about this amendment until it has been treated in the spirit it has. In the first place, the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken about this being Government land. He treats it as if it were a part of the public domain. It is not. Mr. Chairman, this is a tract of land, generally understood to be absolutely valueless, that belongs to the Indians, who themselves are very anxious to sell it, and as quickly as possible. The Secretary of the Interior, I am informed, would like to sell as much of that character of land as he can at as good a price as he can. I happen to know that there were three, four, or five hundred gentlemen throughout this country, not yet associated, under the lead of Mr. Jack Gordon, of Paris, Tex., who negotiated with the two tribes—the Choctaws and the Chickasaws—for this land, thinking it would make a desirable game preserve, and wanted it for that purpose only. They in good faith went to the Indians who own this land, and the councils of the Choctaws and Chickasaws both passed resolutions, approved by their principal chiefs, to sell the tract of land at its appraised value under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior might establish for that purpose. He was unwilling to do that without the sanction of Congress. I do not know that I state it with authority, but I feel sure that he approves this provision. It being an unusual amount of land to sell to private individuals, I was informed by those looking after the matter that he had rather that Congress gave its sanction to it, guarding the measure with such restrictions as it might be thought would eliminate any possibility of speculation or any improper or ulterior motive.

It does not require the Secretary of the Interior to do anything. It simply gives him permission. "That the Secretary of the Interior be permitted" to sell this land, not to any particular individual. It is open to competition in the market of the world. If anybody will pay more for it, he would have a perfect right to purchase it. If it be found that the land is suitable for agricultural, timber, or mineral purposes, or is to be used for any other purpose than as a game preserve, the title reverts to the State or Territory. In my humble judgment, there is nothing in the bill by which fraud could be practiced, nor is there anything of inequity in this provision.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that the coal land that is now being operated in the Indian Territory is wholly such land as the land that is proposed to be sold under this provision?

Mr. REID. The best information I can obtain upon that subject is that it is not true, that there is no coal whatever in this section of the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask you if the surface of these lands is not such as the land referred to?

Mr. REID. No, sir; I should say it is not. This is wild, mountainous land.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that much of the land operated down there as coal land does look wild and rough upon the serface?

Mr. REID. No, sir; I think not, if the gentleman wants my judgment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have seen much of the coal land in the Indian Territory, and I know it would not be appraised as worth 25 cents an acre for any other purpose.

Mr. REID. I will not take issue with the gentleman. Permit me to proceed further; the gentleman's question is immaterial. If the land is valuable for coal or oil, it can not be sold under this provision for this purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that this land has not been prospected for mineral purposes—coal, oil, or gas?

Mr. REID. I think it has.

Mr. CURTIS. The Department sent engineers to this country and they went all over the reservation and reserved all the land that they supposed was coal land, and none of the land supposed to contain coal was included in this reservation.

Mr. MANN. How many borings did they make?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know, they were a long while at it, and it cost a good deal of money.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that much of the development in the Indian Territory in coal, asphalt, oil, and gas has been made by private individuals upon lands that the Government never declared contained either of those things?

Mr. REID. What does the gentleman from Kansas apprehend? The gentleman is perhaps afraid of the fact that coal may subsequently be discovered there.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the idea.

Mr. REID. Well, if these gentlemen are not acting in good faith, if this land is not of the character that they represent it to be, and I am informed that it is, I do not want to stand for this provision, and I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall insert a further amendment providing that if any valuable mineral, coal, or oil, or anything else of that character, be found on the land the title shall revert.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Would not the gentleman favor a reservation of this as a Government game or forest reserve?

Mr. REID. I have no objection. I think it would be best that the Government should reserve it, but the gentleman would not expect this association of individuals to buy a game reserve from the Indians for the Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, not at all. I would prefer that the Government should purchase the land from the Indians at an appraised value and set it apart as a game and forest reserve.

Mr. REID. That is an independent proposition, but the Indians have millions of acres of land suitable for a Government reserve if the Government wants a forest reserve.

Mr. MANN. What kind of game is found there?

Mr. REID. I never hunted there, although I hope to some time. I understand that there is bear, turkey, deer, and that the streams are well stocked with fish. I have it from a gentleman who knows, a man whom I have every reason to rely upon, and he says the land is not suitable for anything else.

Mr. MANN. Then there are streams there?

Mr. REID. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How large a tract would this make—this 100,000 acres?

Mr. REID. I have not figured it out, but probably 4 or 5 miles one way and 6 or 8 another.

Mr. MANN. Yes; 6 miles one way and 25 the other. It would make one township 4 miles wide and 25 long, and there are nearly 25,000 acres in a township—not a very large game preserve for bear.

Mr. REID. No; but the gentleman will find bear in that country on less ground perhaps than in Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I expect if the gentleman found bear at all it would be on less ground than he wanted to find it.

Mr. REID. Now, I hope the gentleman will not take up any more of my time unless he actually wants information.

Mr. MANN. I will not, for I have not got the information I sought.

Mr. REID. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it was found not suitable for a game preserve under this provision it could not be sold. I ask the Clerk to read a letter which I send to the desk from the principal chief to Mr. Jack Gordon, of Paris, Tex.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, CHOCTAW NATION,
Kinta, Ind. T., March 28, 1905.

Mr. JACK GORDON, Esq., Paris, Tex.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your communication with reference to you and your associates' desire to purchase 100,000 acres of mountain land in the southeast portion of the Choctaw Nation, to be used as a game preserve, and further stating that there is but one Indian allottee on the land you desire, and that you would make suitable compensation to him for his improvements in order that he might select land elsewhere, and that you and your associates would pay the appraised price fixed by the Government on the lands in question; and you further requested that this office advise you by letter whether or not the plan would be feasible and whether or not the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations would stand in the way of a consummation of the deal.

Answering for the Choctaw Nation, I desire to say that I am not inclined to oppose the plan you suggest to take over this land at the appraised value for several reasons, viz: The remoteness of the land from the railroad, absence of fertile soil, and scant facilities offered to settlers in that immediate region for a living will to my mind forever preclude any value being placed upon the same beyond that fixed by the Government.

The failure to realize even the surface value of our coal lands in the recent attempt to sell them convinces me that our mountain land will share even a worse fate when placed upon the market. I am therefore led to say that your offer is a reasonable one and that the Department should favorably consider it in the light of facts here presented.

Yours, truly, GREEN MCCURTAIN,
Principal Chief, Choctaw Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REID. That is a statement of facts in regard to the quality of the land made by the principal chief of the nation interested to the extent of two-thirds ownership, I believe, in this land. As he is interested in getting the best price possible, we can assume that he made his statement as strong as the facts would admit. But, as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, the Secretary of the Interior has always been diligent to see that the Indians got a good price, and this provides that it shall be sold under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

He may advertise it for bidders. He may not sell it at all, if he can not get a proposition that he thinks is to the advantage of the Indians—and I take it that after all that is what we are here to consider. If we are to dispose of the estates of these tribes to the best advantage to them, what boots it to us who becomes the purchaser of the land that belongs to them? I would not want to sell it out to speculators, or to somebody that would use it for improper or oppressive purposes, but here is a tract of land which it is said is unfit for other purposes, and it is our duty to get as much for that for the Indians as possible. It belongs to them; it does not belong to the Government. It is proposed by this provision to get more for that land than in any other way on earth. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk a resolution adopted by the tribal councils, which I desire to have read.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before the paper is read, I desire to ask a question. Is there any pressing necessity for the immediate sale of this land?

Mr. REID. Yes; there is.

Mr. SIMS. Do the Indians need the proceeds immediately?

Mr. REID. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman expect this land to go down in value if it is not sold now?

Mr. REID. It is expected that these tribes will dissolve on the 4th day of March, and it is proposed to make a State some day out there, and there are a number of reasons.

Mr. BURLESON. They will simply lose this opportunity to sell.

Mr. REID. Yes; that is it exactly; they will lose the opportunity to sell.

Mr. SIMS. This is to make a game preserve for private owners?

Mr. REID. Yes; they are not buying it for anybody else.

Mr. SIMS. Consequently they will exclude the Indians.

Mr. REID. Oh, there are quite a number of Indians who are members of this association.

Mr. SIMS. I mean those who are not members.

Mr. REID. They would exclude anybody not admitted as a member.

Mr. SIMS. We have been told from childhood up that the Indian values a hunting privilege better than anything else, and in fact he expects to go to the "happy hunting ground" when he dies. These Indians then, I understand, are anxious to sell their lands to deprive themselves of that privilege forever.

Mr. REID. Oh, I do not care to discuss that phase of it.

Mr. BURLESON. If this sale is not made, all the game there will be destroyed and there will be no hunting there at all.

Mr. SIMS. It will cut off the hunting by anybody else.

Mr. REID. Oh, I can not yield to the gentleman further. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the resolution sent to the Clerk's desk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution recommending that the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations be permitted to sell to Jack Gordon and his associates 100,000 acres of land for a game preserve only. (Proposed by Frank Folsom.)

Whereas there are thousands of acres of mountainous and rough lands in the southeastern portion of the Choctaw Nation that can never be of great value as agricultural land; and

Whereas it is the desire of Jack Gordon and his associates to purchase 100,000 acres of said land, all in one body, at its appraised value; and

Whereas there have been very little, if any, of the lands that it is desired to sell that have been allotted by any member of the Choctaw or Chickasaw tribe of Indians; and

Whereas when the selection of this reservation is finally and definitely located, Jack Gordon and his associates express their willingness and intention to satisfactorily settle with all allottees who may be found to have improvements located thereon; and

Whereas it is the purpose of this organization to create of this reservation a game preserve, for the purpose of preserving fish, game, and timber, and for no other purpose: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the general council of the Choctaw Nation assembled, That it is the sense of the Choctaw council that there could be no better disposition made of the lands desired by Jack Gordon and his associates than to dispose of the same at its appraised value; and the Congress of the United States is most earnestly solicited to take the necessary steps looking to the sale of this land to Jack Gordon and his associates at its appraised value: Provided, That if there shall be found to be members of the Choctaw or Chickasaw tribes of Indians who have selected their allotments within the boundaries of said reserve, who shall express their willingness in writing to release and relinquish their allotments and allot elsewhere, that their allotments be canceled upon payment by Jack Gordon and his associates satisfactory compensation for the improvements located thereon, and that such allottee be permitted to allot elsewhere; said lands to be set aside and definitely located by a commission consisting of three or more persons, one to be appointed by the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, one to be appointed by the governor of the Chickasaw Nation, and one to represent Jack Gordon and his associates, whose duty it shall be to locate and to lodge with the Commissioner at Muscogee, Ind. T., within ninety days from the date of favorable action upon this measure by the Congress of the United States, legal and definite description of all the lands desired to compose this reservation which it is desired to sell, which shall be all in one body; and that the Congress of the United States shall make suitable provision with reference to the payment therefor; and that this resolution shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

(This bill passed both houses of the Choctaw council and was approved by the principal chief on November 24, 1905, having passed the senate and house on November 23, 1905.)

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I am hopeful from the close attention given to the reading of this resolution that the Members are getting interested in the proposition. I do not know that there is anything further that I care to say.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. REID. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. There is an objection made here that perhaps there may be mineral in this land—coal or iron or some sort of mineral. If this is to be used for hunting purposes only, what objection would the gentleman have to a reservation of mineral rights?

Mr. REID. None whatever. I have said that.

Mr. JAMES. When this ceases to be a hunting preserve what is to become of the land?

Mr. REID. It is to revert to the State or Territory for school purposes.

Mr. JAMES. And the gentleman has no objection to an amendment of that character?

Mr. REID. No.

Mr. PALMER. About what does the gentleman think this land would be appraised at?

Mr. REID. I have no idea. I could not say. I have never investigated that phase of the subject. I understand the Secretary of the Interior provides by some rules and regulations for competitive bids, and it is proposed by these people to pay its highest appraised value.

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman suppose the land will be appraised for more than 10 or 15 cents an acre?

Mr. REID. Oh, yes; there is no land down there so cheap as that.

Mr. MANN. What is it worth that for?

Mr. REID. For a game preserve. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Nobody can make a game preserve except these men. I understand they can not sell it for any other purpose.

Mr. PALMER. If you owned this land yourself, 6 miles wide and 25 miles long, and did not know what was in it, would you sell it for 10 cents or 50 cents an acre?

Mr. REID. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit, we do know something about what is in it. To be frank with the gentleman, I would like to see these people get the best price they can, and I will say further to the gentleman that I am quite sure the land will never be permitted to be sold for any such sum as that.

Mr. MANN. What is it worth?

Mr. REID. I have no idea, as I stated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to state it was worth a good deal more than 10 cents an acre.

Mr. REID. If it were valuable, I presume it is.

Mr. MANN. What is it worth for a game preserve?

Mr. REID. I have no idea.

Mr. MANN. I am simply trying to get at the fact whether we could put a limitation—to say that if it is sold it must not be sold for less than a dollar an acre, or a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. REID. Well, I have no objection to a limitation that would fix it at, say, a dollar an acre. It is probably worth a dollar an acre, in my judgment, but I will suggest to the gentleman if there is any merit in the proposition at all it is that these people are willing to buy and pay for it, and the Indians want to sell, and there ought not to be an unreasonable restriction. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the Secretary of the Interior, and the amendment is not required.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PALMER. What is the status?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], which is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I give notice that I propose sometime or other, when it is in order, to move as follows:

Provided, That all gold, silver, coal, oil, asphalt, and other minerals, with the right to enter and remove the same, shall be reserved without liability for damages to the surface.

Mr. REID. Just state that again.

Mr. PALMER. Gold, silver, coal, oil, asphalt, and all other minerals.

Mr. REID. I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I believe this more greatly concerns the pleasures of certain gentlemen than the treasuries of the Indians, because I am informed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], although it is in contemplation that this tribe shall be dissolved on March 4, that these lands will still belong to the Indians—will be the property of the Indians—and after they are disposed of, in a year or two or three years from this time, the proceeds of the sale may be divided among them. Is that true?

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that they have already by this bill provided that part of this land shall not be sold for fifteen or twenty years.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. WALDO. It seems to me this is the most remarkable proposition, to have the United States go into the business of furnishing 100,000 acres as a game reserve to anybody who wants to buy it. There is no limitation in here——

Mr. REID. The United States does not own the land.

Mr. WALDO. Well, it amounts to it. It can not be sold unless the United States says so, and they propose to sell it now. It is the most remarkable thing that the United States should now propose to anybody who wants to buy 100,000 acres of land in that country that the Secretary of the Interior shall say is not agricultural, mineral, or timber land that he can buy it provided they can agree on a price. Now, it seems to me, if we once start on any such proposition as that, that the whole of the Rocky Mountains will be sold for a game reserve, and there will not be a foot of land anywhere that the people of the United States or anybody can fish or hunt on unless they own it, and I for one am opposed to any such proposition as this. I do not believe the people of this country will approve of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JAMES. Division.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentlemen understood the amendment they were voting upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the amendment be again reported, so we may know what we are voting upon?

The amendment to the amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that purports to be an amendment to the bill. I do not wish any rights lost in that way. It is an amendment to the committee amendment, while it purports to be an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to the committee amendment as read. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have an amendment that ought to come in somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has simply said he would offer an amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I offer it now, if it is the proper time to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all gas, gold, silver, coal oil, asphalt, and other minerals, with the right to enter and remove the same, shall be reserved without liability or damage to the surface.

The CHAIRMAN. To what portion of the section does the gentleman address this amendment?

Mr. PALMER. To come in at the end of the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment as offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be in order after the committee has disposed of the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. LACEY. This is an amendment to the committee amendment, and this will be in the nature of perfecting that. This is to perfect the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. The committee amendment should be further amended by adding that at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

The Clerk reread the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], which has just been reported by the Clerk.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. MANN. While the amendment which has been adopted adds some to the safety of the original amendment, it does not at all affect the viciousness of the proposition. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. REID], who defended this amendment as ably as a man could do, says that there is a stream upon this ground with plenty of fine fishing in it. I think he said "a stream." Suppose there be a stream there, running 25 miles long, as will be the case probably, because that is the way they would have land along the stream, 25 miles long and one section wide. We are engaged in spending millions of dollars in the West to-day in saving water for irrigation purposes, and here we are, where we have water which perchance may be used for irrigation, proposing to give it to somebody as a private fishing preserve.

Mr. REID. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. REID. The trouble in that country is too much rain. There is no arid land in that section anywhere. We lost a crop there last year on account of too much rain.

Mr. MANN. There may have been too much rain in that country last year, but the record will show that in many years there has been too little rain in that country. Now, I want to say to the gentlemen in this House that my information has been that, while this is called "a game preserve" it is intended for a gambling preserve.

Mr. REID. Has the gentleman any source or reason for believing that?

Mr. MANN. I have no source of authority for it except rumor that has come to me, but I should say it is extremely probable. What kind of game will be preserved on this tract of land 6 miles wide?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask if the gentleman could gamble with any degree of pleasure in that country where bear were about?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. Men gamble where the tiger is; I do not know why bears should frighten them. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Would not their feet get cold?

Mr. MANN. That is what is behind the proposition, in my opinion. There are some very eminent gentlemen in favor of it, and who are in good faith in favor of it, but to give them that right, even if it were only a fishing preserve, I want the gentlemen of the House to go on record as far as they can as to giving 100,000 acres of land for such a purpose. I would like to have one myself, and so would every other gentleman if he should have a chance at one.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Let us amend the bill.

Mr. MANN. But if it is for the purpose of a gambling preserve it ought not to be considered for a moment, and I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. JAMES. Maybe they are fishing for suckers out there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] it did not have any provision for a game preserve in the bill. This provision has been inserted since the bill was introduced. The gentleman from Kansas has stated that while the Secretary of the Interior has power under the bill to sell any amount of this land he desires to any one particular person, that, in his opinion, the Secretary would not sell a tract of 100,000 acres of land to any person or game association for a game preserve.

It is only within ten years, Mr. Chairman, that the wonderful discoveries in gas and oil in the southern part of Kansas and in Oklahoma, not in the mountainous region, but on the plains, have been made there. The Government officials had made an investigation prior to that time, and they had not ascertained that these immense deposits of gas and oil were to be found in those tracts. Now they say that this is a mountainous section of the Indian Territory. The people down there, some five or six hundred thousand white people, have been so busy developing the natural resources of the level country that they have not had an opportunity to go into the mountainous regions to ascertain the natural wealth of those sections. It is natural for men seeking to develop new countries to go in and develop where it is easiest. As soon as the rush of people from the distant States into——

Mr. REID. I will ask my friend from New York if he understands that all of these valuable rights are reserved by this amendment. It is not proposed that they shall be disposed of.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand now, at the suggestion of members of this committee, these rights are to be preserved.

Mr. REID. The gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him again. It was suggested in the committee that made up the bill, and it was there discussed before the provision was put in. I think it is agreed that when we provide that it be sold under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe we protect all those privileges, and his well-known jealousy of the Indian's rights assures us that that will be properly done. It was on that suggestion that we had this proposition made here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the men who go into a wild country naturally settle in the lowlands; and in the Indian Territory they have been developing the asphalt, the coal, the gas, and oil wealth of that country. Just as soon as there are no fields to be exploited in that portion of the country their attention will be directed to the mountainous region. It is said that this land is not valuable timber, agricultural, or mineral land. It is a mountainous country, with water on it; and there may be valuable water power there, the rights to which have not been covered in any amendment thus far suggested. It is, in my opinion, a vicious policy for the Government of the United States to have any part in any scheme to establish a game preserve, unless it is purely a governmental game preserve, where the people from all sections of the country, under proper regulations, would have the right to go in and hunt. This scheme initiates a new policy in this country, and to have the Government contribute in any way to taking up or making possible the holding of immense tracts of land is so contrary to all the institutions and traditions of the Government that I hope there will be no hesitancy on the part of anybody in voting against the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. REID. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 35.

So the amendment of the committee as amended was rejected.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 16 add the following: "Provided further, That agricultural lands shall be sold in tracts not exceeding 160 acres to any one person."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment of the same character, but I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I send up the following amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 20, after the word "tribes," amend by inserting the following: "Provided, That the surface ground of the segregated coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations shall be sold separately from the coal and asphalt under said lands. Said coal and asphalt deposits shall be, and are hereby, reserved for the use and benefit of said Indians as a permanent school fund. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to lease said coal and asphalt lands, under existing laws, and also to sell the land containing said deposits, under the law providing for the sale of excess Indian lands, reserving the coal and asphalt deposits in said lands for the purposes above mentioned: And provided further, That none of said agricultural lands shall be sold in quantities to exceed 160 acres to any one person or corporation, and no lease shall be made for mining purposes on said coal and asphalt lands or deposits to exceed 160 acres to any one person or corporation: And provided further, That no deed or patent hereafter issued to any allottee shall convey any title to any land within 30 feet of any section line, and 30 feet of land around the outside of every section of land shall be reserved to the tribes as commons for the purposes of ingress and egress to the lands of said allottees, subject, however, to be dedicated by the legislature of any Territory or State as public highways, and in the event of such dedication the lands so dedicated shall be paid for by such State, Territory, or county in such manner as such legislature and the Secretary of the Interior may agree upon; and the said Secretary shall represent said tribes and act as their agent in the dedication of such highways, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and the money paid for the lands so dedicated shall constitute a part of the common school fund of such tribe."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the first part of this amendment provides that the surface ground of the segregated coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations shall be sold separately from the coal and asphalt under the said lands, and a reservation made of these minerals. That, to my mind, would be the best disposition that could be made of the 400,000 acres of segregated land. As I said this morning in my opening remarks on this matter, it appears to me that, in order to make this a great State in connection with Oklahoma, there should be some provision made for the education of the children, and there can be no better provision than this magnificent body of land of 400,000 acres that has underlying the valuable deposits of coal and asphalt. This amendment goes to the effect that the land shall be separated from the coal and the asphalt, the surface sold for farming purposes the same as the excess lands; that the mineral deposits shall be leased to any corporation or person who desires not exceeding 160 acres. It strikes me that this would be the best disposition that we could make of this property.

The next amendment has been already suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. The third amendment is:

Provided further, That no deed or patent hereafter issued to any allottee shall convey any title to any land within 30 feet of any section line.

That provides for highways in that country. The great trouble with the Indian Territory is that the Indian lands are being allotted and leaving no provision for highways. This would leave 30 feet from the section line on each side, making 60 feet for a road, and that land is reserved to the Indian tribe for future legislation by the Territory or State, so that the Indians would get pay from the State or Territory when dedicated for public purposes. The Indians would receive the benefit of their own highways, and I see no objection that anyone could have to either amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. In the first place, as I said a few moments ago, we provide in the statehood bill a fund of $5,000,000 in lieu of school lands in the Indian Territory, and it would be unfair to the Indians to take the coal lands, of the value of ten or fifteen million dollars, and turn them over to support schools that ought to be supported by the State. The Indians own this coal, and we have agreed to sell it for them and to deposit the money to their credit, and when their affairs are finally disposed of, to divide it among the members of the tribe, and we ought to keep that agreement. We have no right to take ten or fifteen million dollars that belong to the Indians and give it to the new State or to the Territory, and we ought to keep our agreement and sell these lands.

This committee voted a few minutes ago for an amendment reserving the leased and unleased coal lands from sale at this time, so that Congress can in the future make some disposition of them as it sees fit. Why not leave the whole question open and let Congress at a future day provide for the disposition of these coal lands? I say to Members of this House that I hope some provision will be made for their sale as soon as possible, so that the affairs of the tribe may be settled. I ask for a vote, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to bring suit in the name of the United States, for the use of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes, respectively, either before or after the dissolution of the tribal governments, for the collection of any moneys or recovery of any land claimed by any of said tribes, whether such claim shall arise prior to or after the dissolution of the tribal governments, and the United States courts in Indian Territory are hereby given jurisdiction to try and determine all such suits, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to pay from the funds of the tribe interested any costs and necessary expenses incurred in maintaining and prosecuting such suits: Provided, That proceedings to which any of said tribes is a party pending before any court or tribunal at the date of dissolution of the tribal governments shall not be thereby abated or in anywise affected, but shall proceed to final disposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, between lines 8 and 9, insert: "Provided further, That any person or persons, firm, corporation, or company having any claim of any nature whatever against the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, or Seminole tribe of Indians, respectively, may file suit before the Court of Claims of the United States at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, and the Court of Claims of the United States at Washington is hereby given jurisdiction to entertain, try, and determine all such suits.

Any person or persons, firm, corporation, or company having a claim against the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribe of Indians and fails, neglects, or refuses to file suit for the same before the United States court of appeals at Washington, D. C., within ninety days after the passage of this act shall be forever barred.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The reason for that is that this section provides that the Secretary of the Interior may bring suit for these Indians against anyone who owes them money, but there is nowhere any provision that when the tribes owe money to any parties and the tribes go out of existence that you can collect the money. There may be outstanding debts. I know of none. I know of no warrants or indebtedness whatever, but it does seem to me a strange provision that the Indians are permitted to bring suit for money owing to them, and yet if they are owing anyone that person is without remedy in law. It seems to me this amendment ought to be adopted in order to make this bill perfect.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman surely does not understand this bill. Section 11 provides for the payment of all legal claims against these tribes, and provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall investigate them and pay them. The effect of this amendment would be to open up the Court of Claims to parties who have claims, who have been coming before Congress for forty years in an attempt to get into some court to prosecute old and unjust claims against the Indians. It would be an outrage upon these tribes to permit people to bring suits in the Court of Claims against them. All manner of claims could be trumped up against them under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas if it was adopted, and I sincerely hope it will be voted down. We have provided amply in section 11 for the payment of every lawful claim that any citizen may have against the Five Civilized Tribes or either of them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I should like to ask the gentleman why he thinks the Secretary of the Interior should pass upon these claims. Why not permit the opening of the courts to them? It would be a judicial question.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman knows that for years people with old stale claims have been trying to get into the Court of Claims and mulct these Indian tribes, if they could. We believe that the Secretary of the Interior is honest, and that he will carefully investigate every claim that is filed, and that he will render such judgment as he thinks fair and proper in the case. We think it is proper to leave it in his hands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why do you give the tribes the right to go into the courts? Why do you leave the courts open to them, and close the courts against the tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. Because there is no other way that a claim of the Indians can be collected. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That all the restrictions upon the alienation of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, except Indians of full blood and except minors, are, except as to "homesteads," hereby removed, and all restrictions upon the alienation of lands of allottees of said tribes who are full-blood Indians, except minors and except as to "homesteads," may be removed by the Secretary of the Interior under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, but the removal of the restrictions upon alienation shall not in any manner affect leases, and for the purpose of this section the quantum of Indian blood possessed by any member of said tribes shall be determined by the rolls of citizens of said tribes approved by the Secretary of the Interior. Full-blood Indian allottees of said tribes may alienate any of the lands allotted to them, except homesteads, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise, and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed: Provided, That the lands upon which restrictions are removed shall be subject to taxation and the other lands shall be exempt from taxation as long as the title remains in the original allottee.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 16, line 16, after the word "alienation," add the words "and leasing."

Page 16, line 24, strike out after the word "prescribe" down to and including the word "leases" in line 25, same page.

Page 17, line 12, after the word "allottee," add: "Provided further, That full-blood members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes are hereby authorized to sell their surplus lands as follows: One-fourth in acreage in one year, one-fourth in acreage in three years, and the balance in five years from the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the three committee amendments will be voted upon in gross.

Mr. MURPHY. I want to offer an amendment as a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I wish to make an inquiry. Are the committee amendments adopted?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, ought not the committee amendments be voted upon before the substitute is considered?

The CHAIRMAN. They have priority.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, I ask for a vote on the committee amendments. The gentleman can offer his amendment afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute will properly be considered after the committee amendments have been voted upon. The Chair suggested that if there was no objection the three committee amendments would be voted upon in gross.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to make an inquiry regarding the three committee amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is, whether the authorization to the full-blood members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, on page 18, to dispose of their lands requires the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; and this provision follows the language of the treaty. I might say both agreements that were made with the Chickasaws and the Choctaws give the members the right to sell their surplus lands, as is provided in this amendment, except the provision agreement fixed the date at the issuance of the patent, while this amendment fixed the date at the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas this question: It has been the uniform policy of the Government, has it not, to permit Indian allottees to alienate their lands for twenty or twenty-five years?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; until a few years ago.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did not that removal of that restriction go through this House without one in twenty Members of the House knowing that that law had been changed?

Mr. CURTIS. I think not. It was discussed on the floor, if I recollect, by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have spoken to a great many Members and they were very greatly surprised when they ascertained it.

Mr. CURTIS. It was also opposed, according to my recollection, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and myself, and it was up for some time.

Mr. MURPHY. This only applied to negroes, to freedmen.

Mr. CURTIS. It applied to the intermarried whites—freedmen.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; among the Cherokees.

Mr. CURTIS. No restrictions have been removed as to the full-blood Indians, and this does not remove it as to full bloods, but the restrictions are removed by this act upon Indians less than full blood.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the policy of the Government has been up until very recently, when that restriction was removed, to prevent that alienation for twenty or twenty-five years.

Mr. CURTIS. The item referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin only applied to freedmen and intermarried whites.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The removal only applies to them?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But now you remove that as to the Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, except Indians of full blood, and then you permit the Secretary of the Interior to do away with that restriction.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; as to the full bloods.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In his discretion.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the present law. There was a law passed three or four years ago authorizing a full-blood Indian to file an application with the Indian agent, and if, upon investigation, he found the Indian was qualified that he should so recommend to the Department, and that would give the Secretary of the Interior a right to remove the restriction. That is the law to-day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much is a homestead for these Indians?

Mr. CURTIS. In all except the Chickasaws and Choctaws 40 acres. That is, in the three tribes—the Seminoles, the Cherokees, and the Creeks—it is 40 acres, and in the Chickasaws and Choctaws 160 acres.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman consider 40 acres of land is sufficient for a homestead?

Mr. CURTIS. I do; and that is more than many of them will farm.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of course the committee has investigated the matter very thoroughly——

Mr. CURTIS. This provision, except the leasing clause, was sent to the committee by the Department of the Interior, and the provision was prepared by a committee organized for the purpose of preparing a bill to finally dispose of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In my judgment, the policy of absolutely prohibiting the alienation by the Indian allottees of their lands for twenty-five years was founded in wisdom, and, in my judgment, the removal of the restriction will result in the getting away of the land from nine out of ten Indians in a very short time; and I think the urgent appeals for it by some of the lobbyists who talked to me about it in previous years, when I first came here, was that the Indians did not know enough to take care of themselves. Of course the natural conclusion would be that the man thought it was better to take away what little they did have and so prevent them absolutely from taking care of themselves.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, heretofore when land has been allotted the Indian has simply been allowed a homestead. That is why restrictions have not been removed. All the surplus land has been sold by the Government and the money deposited to the credit of the tribe. But in the Five Civilized Tribes the land belonged to the tribe. The tribes have their patents.

Now, we provide for the allotment of a homestead just as we did with the other Indians, and in this bill we prevent him from selling the homestead. The restrictions are not removed as to the homestead. We treat him just as we did the Indian on the Indian reservation, but we permit him to sell the surplus land, while in the other cases the Government has sold the surplus land for him; because it is his land we permit him to sell it. In the other cases the Indians did not have patents. There are only a few tribes left which have patents to their lands as tribes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But with the Chickasaws and Choctaws——

Mr. CURTIS. They have a patent. But the agreements with them provided that their surplus lands could be sold as provided in this amendment and this provision, except the part in regard to leasing and the amendment in regard to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, was drawn at the Department.

Mr. LACEY. The bill provides in section 19 that the Choctaw, the Chickasaw, the Cherokee, the Creek, and the Seminole tribes, except Indians of full blood, may sell their lands, except the homesteads.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And the full-blooded Indians may alienate their lands, except homesteads, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Now, it is provided that the full-blooded members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes are authorized to sell their surplus lands in a certain way. What is there peculiar about the situation of the Choctaws and Chickasaws that would entitle them to this greater privilege as compared with the Cherokees, the Creeks, and the Seminoles?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is what struck me as peculiar.

Mr. CURTIS. That matter was fought out in the committee. The position taken by the subcommittee was voted down, and a majority of the House Committee voted against the report of the subcommittee and directed that we place an amendment in this bill authorizing the Choctaws and Chickasaws to sell their surplus lands as was provided in their agreements.

In each agreement with the Chickasaws and Choctaws—the original agreement and the supplemental—we provided that they could sell one-fourth of the surplus land one year after patent had been issued, one-fourth in three years, and the remaining one-half in five years.

Mr. MANN. That is put in not because they were to make the sale, but because of the agreement to do it.

Mr. CURTIS. Because of the agreement made with those people and ratified by a majority of the tribe.

Mr. MANN. Of course the agreement we made is not any act, or we would not confirm it.

Mr. CURTIS. These agreements were very good; they were carefully considered.

Mr. MANN. But not legal.

Mr. CURTIS. Not unless we ratify them, and we had to pass an act of Congress. They were ratified by act of Congress.

Mr. MANN. I presume there is nothing there that binds anybody so we could not put a provision in the bill. Now, what I wanted to ask the gentleman was whether this required the approval of anybody?

Mr. CURTIS. It does not.

Mr. MANN. How much do any of these Indians own?

Mr. CURTIS. The homestead of the Choctaws and Chickasaws will be 160 acres, and they probably will have, if you include this vast territory in the mountains, 400 acres apiece, that would be about 240 acres over and above their homestead.

Mr. MANN. I have heard it said some families had over a thousand acres.

Mr. CURTIS. Families, yes; but this goes to each individual man, woman, and child; each will have on an average 400 acres apiece.

Mr. MANN. So that a family might easily dispose of 2,000 acres of land.

Mr. CURTIS. No; minors can not sell.

Mr. MANN. It would be in the neighborhood of seven or eight hundred acres of land that they could sell.

Mr. CURTIS. I should say so.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely at any price they wish, whether drunk or sober.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think it is a little dangerous to let these people holding that land be allowed to sell to any speculator who comes along and gets hold of them and gets a deed out of them?

Mr. CURTIS. When the provisions were consented to by the Dawes Commission and the Department I thought a mistake had been made, but the Department favored the agreement. It was almost impossible to make an agreement with these Indians, they wanted the provision put in, they voted for it as a tribe, and it was ratified by a majority, and I thought as it was their own land and they wanted to do it, and as it was satisfactory to the Commission which had been there looking up their affairs it was only proper to agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to have additional time to answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Now, you propose to sell one-fourth at a time and one-fourth at another time?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the reason of that—that it will not sell for as much?

Mr. CURTIS. That is so they could not get rid of it all at one time.

Mr. MANN. That is to keep the price down.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, I beg your pardon, this was so he could not sell 400 acres of land at one time; that if he was inclined to sell and squander it he could not do it all at one time.

Mr. MANN. So that it would not all go at once.

Mr. CURTIS. And it is more likely if he sells small tracts at different periods he will use the money in improving his homestead.

Mr. MANN. Instead of having one grand spree, keep the spree running for five years.

Mr. CURTIS. Give him a few.

Mr. MANN. What are the agreements to which the gentleman referred that the Indians ratified?

Mr. CURTIS. Under the old policy treaties were made with Indian tribes, but the act of 1871 provided that no further treaties should be made with them, and since that time the Government has dealt with them by entering into agreements. Under the old treaties the Indians in the Indian Territory were promised patents to their lands, and such patents were issued to each of the Five Tribes. As I said in my opening remarks, conditions became such in the Indian Territory that a change was necessary. Large tracts of land were in the possession of intermarried whites, half-breeds, etc., and in order to change the conditions Congress thought it necessary, to protect the rights of all, to make agreements with them. That was in order to remove all questions of doubt and to make a division of their lands and property which would be legal. And so the commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes was authorized to negotiate agreements with these tribes. They did enter into negotiations.

Mr. MANN. On behalf of the Government?

Mr. CURTIS. On behalf of the Government the agreements were entered into and were submitted to and ratified by a majority of the members of the tribes, and were ratified by Congress, and the lands of the tribes have been allotted according to the terms of the various agreements.

Mr. MANN. I am asking the gentleman what the agreements were.

Mr. CURTIS. One provision was that the Choctaws and Chickasaws should have the right to sell the surplus land as provided herein, the agreements provided for dividing the lands, the appraisement of all the lands, the selection of homesteads, the making of rolls—in short, to do all that was necessary to change the lands and moneys from tribal to individual holdings.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention of this amendment to so operate by law to fulfill one agreement with the Indians?

Mr. CURTIS. Exactly; taking the words of the agreement. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. In the original bill it is proposed that this agreement, permitting these Indians of the full blood to sell their lands, can really be carried out by getting special authority in each case, depending on these reports from the Secretary of the Interior. Now, if we do not adopt this last amendment, all of the Indians who really ought to dispose of their lands can have opportunities to do so; and I ask my friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]—and I ask him because I feel that his intimate knowledge of the situation there is worth a great deal to us—whether it would not be well to leave out this last committee amendment at the end of section 19 and adopt the other amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that, as he no doubt remembers, the subcommittee of which I had the honor to be the chairman reported leaving out the provision in regard to the Choctaws and Chickasaws. It was the full committee that recommended putting it in. My judgment is that we ought to strike it out; but, gentlemen, I have been instructed by the committee to present this bill, and I am defending the bill as I was directed to report it.

Mr. LACEY. Does the gentleman not think it would be a good thing to strike it out?

Mr. CURTIS. I should not have reported leaving it out if I had not thought it the proper and best thing to do. It was put in the bill, as I say, by a vote of the majority of the members of the committee as a committee amendment, and I am here defending the committee bill. If you desire my opinion of it, I will say the best thing for the Chickasaws and Choctaws would be to treat them the same as you do the Indians of the other three tribes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is the gentleman's opinion as a man, and not as a Member of Congress?

Mr. CURTIS. No; it is my opinion as both.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I want the gentleman's opinion as an individual.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my opinion as a man and as a Member of Congress, but I am presenting this bill as chairman of a subcommittee selected to present the committee bill.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, then, is really going against his own knowledge?

Mr. CURTIS. I am presenting a committee amendment, which personally I do not think best, and when my opinion was asked I gave it, but it would hardly be proper for me to present a bill for the committee and oppose the amendments which had been voted to it by a majority of that committee. The amendment is here for the action of this committee.

Mr. LACEY. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that we have a separate vote on the last amendment, because I think we ought to knock it out.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a separate vote demanded on either one of the committee amendments?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir; on the last one.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Let us understand what the amendment is. I ask unanimous consent that it may be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk, without objection, will report the third amendment.

The Clerk reread the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Gentlemen, I hope this language will not be striken out of this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that we vote on the other two amendments first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments to this section, except the amendment just read by the Clerk.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. This does not include the authority to sell the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote as now proposed does not include the amendment that has just been read by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment: On page 17, line 19, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, line 19, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment relating to the proviso, commencing on line 6 and ending at line 10.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 18.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers the following substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a substitute for section 19 the following:

"That the restrictions on the alienation and taxation of land in Indian Territory, both as to adults and minors, except as to the homestead of those shown by the records of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes to be of full Indian blood, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

"That this act shall not be construed to permit any minor to lease or dispose of his allotment, except through a legally appointed guardian, and then only in the manner prescribed by law for the estate of minors in force at the time in said Indian Territory."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I have spent three years in the Indian Territory, and I came from there to Congress. I was acting as attorney for one of these tribes, and I think I know something about their ability to transact their own affairs. And I want to say that when I hear Members talking about robbing the Indians, or that they do not know how to take care of their own affairs, I know they were never in the Indian Territory. If one of those gentlemen would walk along the streets in any town in that beautiful country and meet one of these men they call "Indians," he would not know he was an Indian. There are no blanket Indians in Indian Territory. We have made them United States citizens in two acts; and yet we say to them, after heretofore allowing them to have their own courts and government, to pass upon life and liberty, they all of a sudden have become so incompetent that they can not take care of one little parcel of land. This substitute provides that they may dispose of all their lands except the homestead—the 40 acres of the Creek Nation and the different homesteads of the other various tribes—that they may dispose of all of the surplus to whom they see fit. It provides that the minor's land, except that of the minor full blood, may be disposed of by the guardians in the manner provided by law at the time of that sale.

Now, the restrictions, so far as the Creek Nation is concerned, have been removed from the freedmen—the negro—who knows as much about taking care of his own affairs as any negro in any State. Then, I ask you, why the necessity of saying to the freedmen of these tribes that you shall still hold 40 acres more for twenty-one years?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I will ask my friend if in his experience of three years in the Indian Territory he did not observe that many of the full bloods who selected their allotments were brought in to the officer of the Government who had charge of the allotments by some real estate agent, and if the Indian did not testify that he had his fare paid and that his hotel bill had been paid by this same land agent?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; I saw that; and I further saw, under the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior removing the restrictions upon the sale of a town site there, full blood Indians who could not read or write that were led in there by these people and paid $10,000 in cash.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, I will ask the gentleman further if it is not true that a large majority of these full blood Indians do not know where the allotments are that they have had made in many instances?

Mr. MURPHY. No; I do not belive that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask if it is not the fact that their allotments have been selected for them by the land agents, and that they have been taken to the allotments by the land agents, and that they had not seen the land until taken to it by the land agents for the first time?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know. I have heard that outside of the Indian Territory.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have heard it inside of the Indian Territory.

Mr. MURPHY. I have not. But now you take the minors' land away. Here are minors that own allotments and yet they are in an orphan asylum in the Indian Territory, being supported by the Indian government, their allotment being leased by some guardian; yet they are not suffered to sell it, and are reaping no benefit from it.

This land could be sold and the proceeds probably invested in a better form, when they could be educated and be made better citizens of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. As I understand, the gentleman was for several years the attorney for the Creek Nation.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And perhaps the gentleman still has some interest for them, so far as may not be inconsistent, of course, with his Congressional duties.

Mr. MURPHY. No; I do not own a foot of land in the Indian Territory, and do not expect to.

Mr. LACEY. Very well, then.

Mr. MURPHY. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask him, as having represented that nation up to the time when he became a Member of Congress, whether in his opinion it is for the best interests of the Indians of the Creek Nation to give them unlimited power of alienation?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; and I think they desire it themselves.

Mr. LACEY. Of course they desire it, but does not the gentleman think that a very large number of them would soon become public charges if unlimited power of alienation were extended to them?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir; I do not, but I think that unless you do remove the restrictions upon the sale of their lands that they will become public charges.

Now, we are talking about bringing in this country as a State. How are we going to raise taxes unless you remove the restrictions upon the alienation and taxation of the land there? For instance, I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] will agree with me that, upon an average, an Indian family will be composed of a man, his wife, and five children. I think that is the average. Take the full bloods, under the bill as at present constituted, and not one foot of the land belonging to that family can be sold, and there will be 800 acres.

Mr. LACEY. I think the gentleman overlooks the features of the bill. The main body of the bill provides that they can sell, but they must first get the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, which can be given in the cases to which he refers.

Mr. MURPHY. Supposing he refuses the authority to sell?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That would be evidence of some good reason why they ought not to sell.

Mr. MURPHY. Let me ask the gentleman something else. If you remove the restrictions to selling the land, does that remove the restrictions on taxation?

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps not. It may not.

Mr. MANN. If the land is sold, is it not to be taxed?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, I misunderstood the gentleman. Of course, when the land is sold and the title passes to somebody else, then the land will be taxed.

Mr. CURTIS. The act provides that the lands upon which restrictions are removed shall be subject to taxation, and that the other lands shall be exempt from taxation as long as title remains in the allottee.

Mr. MURPHY. Does that mean restrictions removed by the Secretary of the Interior or restrictions removed here?

Mr. CURTIS. It means all restrictions. When they are removed the land becomes subject to taxation.

Mr. MURPHY. I believe it is for the best interests of every Indian in the Indian Territory, except for the 40-acre homestead, the homestead of the full blood, to allow him to sell his surplus land, and not tie him up, as is wanted to be done, and let him, as they say, spend his money piecemeal. But if the restrictions are removed by the Secretary of the Interior, will not the money be turned over to him in a lump sum, so that he can squander it all at once? But I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that they would squander their money in that way.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MURPHY. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the agents of the Secretary of the Interior ascertain the particular ability of the individual Indian to alienate his land before he is permitted to alienate it by order of the Secretary?

Mr. MURPHY. I understand that they have an agent of that kind who does that, who goes upon the land and ascertains the value of the land—an "appraiser," as he is called. I understand that to be the fact; yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then there is no danger of loss to the Indians where the Secretary permits the sale?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know whether there would be or not, but I do know of tracts that have been sold in this way that could have been sold at a public sale, at a sale in the market, for a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars more than was obtained at the sale under these rules and regulations.

Mr. MANN. That is what we are afraid may happen in the future.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; but they could have got more upon the open market.

Mr. MANN. But if they had unlimited power of alienation there would be no such thing as a sale upon the open market.

Mr. MURPHY. I will tell the gentleman from Illinois that I believe 90 per cent of the Indians outside of the full bloods—yes, I will say 99 per cent—are as competent to transact their own business as any average white man in the United States.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had said "as the gentleman from Illinois," it would not have proven anything at all, as far as the sale of land was concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri will be voted down. It is more objectionable than the amendment which was voted down a few minutes ago. He would have us remove all restrictions from the Indians in the Indian Territory, and notwithstanding the fact he has been the attorney for the Creeks for three years, I can not help saying that he is mistaken about the situation. It is true that there is not a blanket Indian in the Indian Territory, but there are a good many Indians in the Creek Nation who are just as bad off as the blanket Indians upon other reservations in the United States, and who need the protection of the Government just as much now as many blanket Indians upon other reservations in the country.

Here just the other day I took a member of the tribe to the White House, who represents 2,000 Creek Indians of the Crazy

Snake band, a band of Indians who have held out against all treaties and agreements of every kind. The gentleman from Missouri will not say that members of the Crazy Snake band of Indians are fit to handle their own business and that all restrictions should be removed from their lands.

Gentlemen, the thing to do is to vote for this bill as it is, leaving to the Secretary the right to remove restrictions in such cases of full bloods as he thinks best.

I ask for a vote.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri should prevail. I do not believe that placing the matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior will be for the best interests of that country. It is the universal objection of the people of the country that the Secretary has the control of these Indian affairs down there, because he is so far away that it is impossible to get him to act promptly. They get an opportunity to sell, but before the authority of the Secretary can be obtained so much time elapses that business accumulates and the opportunity passes by. We should have some other means of arriving at the disposition of those lands. If the courts of the country had the right to remove those restrictions it would be much better; but the Indians themselves have come to Congress time and again and asked that they be given the right to sell and dispose of their own lands, and but a few minutes ago this House refused to permit the Indians to sell their lands under rules and regulations that they had already prescribed—that is, one-fourth in one year, one-half in two years, and the balance in five years. That was voted out of this bill, and it is certainly wrong, because the Indians themselves, speaking through their tribal organizations, in their proper relations to this Congress, and the matter being ratified by Congress by treaty agreement, have been permitted by that agreement to alienate their lands.

Now, here comes Congress, which is wiser than the Indians, and says that they shall not alienate their lands. If you turn the country loose, let the Indians control their own property, it would be better for the Indians and better for the white people of that country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURPHY) there were—ayes 6, noes 22.

So the substitute was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That after the approval of this act all leases and rental contracts of allottees and freedmen of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes shall be in writing and subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be absolutely void and of no effect without such approval: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may remove, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, this restriction upon leasing from all allottees and allotted lands except as to homesteads of allottees of Indian blood and freedmen, and lands allotted to freedmen of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes shall be considered "homesteads," and shall be subject to all the provisions of this or any other act of Congress applicable to the "homesteads" of the citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes: Provided further, That allotments of minors and incompetents may be rented or leased under order of the proper court with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 12, page 18, after the word "of," insert the words "full blood" and strike out the words "and freedmen."

Beginning in line 16, after the word "approval," strike out all down to and including the word "tribes" in line 24.

In line 25 strike out the word "further."

On page 19, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the several committee amendments.

The amendments were considered, and agreed to.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 13, after the word "tribes," insert the words "for a period of more than twelve months."

Mr. REID. Under the provisions of the bill as it stands all contracts for the lease of lands must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. That embraces the ordinary rental contract from year to year, and my information is it is impracticable and puts an impediment on the freedom of contract that inures to the disadvantage of the Indian. It seems to me that the Indian can not be very materially injured by being permitted to make his own contracts for one year. Of course, if it was for a long period of time he might be defrauded. But it takes considerable time to provide a lease, send it up here to Washington, have it approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and have it returned. There have been many complaints of contracts of that kind requiring approval by the Secretary being delayed, and in many instances it has resulted in the Indian not being able to rent his land.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the amendment, Mr. Chairman, will be voted down.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That if any allottee of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribe die without successor, seized of all or any portion of his allotment prior to the final distribution of the tribal property, and such fact shall be known by the Secretary of the Interior, the lands allotted to him shall revert to the tribe and be disposed of as herein provided for surplus lands; but if the death of such allottee be not known by the Secretary of the Interior before final distribution of the tribal property, the land shall escheat to and vest in such State or Territory as may be formed to include said lands.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 4, page 19, after the word "die," insert the word "intestate."

In line 5 strike out the word "successor" and insert the words "widow, heir or heirs, or surviving spouse."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments to section 31.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That the adult heirs of any deceased Indian of either of the Five Civilized Tribes whose selection has been made, or to whom a deed or patent has been issued for his or her share of the land of the tribe to which he or she belongs or belonged, may sell and convey the lands inherited from such decedent; and if there be both adult and minor heirs of such decedent, then such minors may join in a sale of such lands by a guardian duly appointed by the proper United States court for the Indian Territory. And in case of the organization of a State or Territory, then by a proper court of the county in which said minor or minors may reside, upon an order of such court made upon petition filed by guardian. All conveyances made under this provision are to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 24, after the word "reside," insert the words "or in which said real estate is situated."

In line 2, page 20, after the word "provision," insert the words "by heirs who are full-blood Indians or minors."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the committee amendment, page 20, line 2, the words "or minors."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I can not see the necessity for having the courts pass upon the sale of the minors and then have them sent to the Secretary of the Interior to be approved.

Mr. CURTIS. The committee amendment only applies to minors who are full bloods. It is thought best to leave all the full bloods in the hands of the Secretary, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments to the section.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 22, page 19, in line 20, by striking out the word "minors" and substituting the word "heirs" therefor; and in line 24 strike out the words "minor or minors" and insert the word "heirs" in lieu thereof; and on page 20 and line 3, after the word "the," add the words "court appointing such guardian," and strike out the words "Secretary of the Interior under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, that would make the section read as follows:

SEC. 22. That the adult heirs of any deceased Indian of either of the Five Civilized Tribes whose selection has been made, or to whom a deed or patent has been issued for his or her share of the land of the tribe to which he or she belongs or belonged, may sell and convey the lands inherited from such decedent; and if there be both adult and minor heirs of such decedent, then such heirs may join in a sale of such lands by a guardian duly appointed by the proper United States court for the Indian Territory. And in case of the organization of a State or Territory, then by a proper court of the county in which said heirs may reside or in which said real estate is situated, upon an order of such court made upon petition filed by guardian. All conveyances made under this provision by heirs who are full-blood Indians or minors are to be subject to the approval of the court appointing such guardian, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Now, we have the strange condition of affairs here in this bill that we have a United States court assuming the guardianship of adult heirs of deceased Indians, and these adult heirs may be three-fourths white, as far as we know, but they are adult heirs of deceased Indians, who get the lands that formerly belonged to the deceased Indians. Now, we provide that these may go into the proper United States court, that they may have the guardians appointed for them, and then further provides that in case of the organization of a State or Territory, then by a proper court of the county in which said minor or minors may reside, or in which said real estate is situated, upon an order of such court made upon the petition filed by the guardian. After the conveyances are made by the United States courts, or the Territorial or State courts, then they must go to the Secretary of the Interior here in Washington and have these orders of courts affirmed. What do we have now in this country? I understood we always had three branches of government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial.

Here we have the judiciary supervised by an executive in the city of Washington—running two departments together. I do not understand why this should be done. When we leave the matter of appointing these guardians with the courts, why not let the courts ratify the deeds or make the deeds and control the whole matter? Why let the Secretary of the Interior or any other man here in the Department overrule the courts of the country?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I am bound to say that I do not believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has carefully read this section. He does not understand it if he has. There is no provision for the appointment of a guardian for adult heirs. It provides that the adult heirs may sell for themselves, and if there are minors, the minors may join in the sale by a guardian, to be appointed by a court. The guardian is appointed only for the minor. The last part of the section retains in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior the control of the property belonging to full bloods, because in other sections of the bill we have reserved to the Secretary control of the land owned by full-blood Indians, and the last section only applies to full-blood Indians and full-blood minors.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Are not their rights dedicated in the courts, and does it not come under their supervision?

Mr. CURTIS. We do not take it away from the Secretary of the Interior in any place in this bill, and I am of the opinion and a majority of the committee agreed, that the Secretary should continue to control the land of the full-blood Indian.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Suppose the Secretary overrules the judgment and decree of the court and holds they are invalid? Then you have two branches of the Government fighting each other.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no danger of that. Mr. Chairman, I now ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 23. Every person of lawful age and sound mind may by last will and testament devise all of his estate, real and personal, and all interest therein: Provided, That no will of a full-blood Indian devising real estate shall be valid unless acknowledged before a judge of the United States court for the Indian Territory or a United States commissioner: Provided further, That the law of the Territory of Oklahoma regulating the descent and distribution of real estate and other property shall apply to all real and personal property in the Indian Territory."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire why the law controlling Oklahoma is inserted here? For a great many years it has been the custom to extend over this country Mansfield's Digest, which is the law of Arkansas.

Mr. CURTIS. The laws of Arkansas in reference to inheritance are very complicated, and a great deal of trouble has arisen in the Indian Territory over the disposition of inherited property, but I believe with the amendments we have put in line 5, page 19, that we might very well leave the lands to be disposed of under the laws of Arkansas.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is that most of the men practicing law in the Indian Territory are thoroughly familiar with the provisions of the Arkansas law, which is Mansfield's Digest——

Mr. CURTIS. I doubt that very much, from what I have heard some of them say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is that Oklahoma law——

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, strike out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, that enables us to meet the objection raised by the gentleman from New York——

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the gentleman, I am perfectly willing that his amendment may be agreed to, in order to hurry the bill along.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman, in line 5, page 19, appear the words "widow or surviving spouse." What is the difference between a widow and surviving spouse?

Mr. CURTIS. I will refer that to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. That is very simple; in some cases there is a widow and in some cases a widower.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is a spouse a widower?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes; he is after his wife is dead.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OVERSTREET, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5976, and had directed him to report the same with certain amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on the amendments? If not, the vote will be taken in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10707) to provide for the improvement in breeding of horses for general-purpose uses, and to enable the United States to procure better remounts for the cavalry and artillery service, and the same was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 68. An act relating to the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SAMUEL was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, to meet to-morrow, Friday, January 19, 1906, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Fernandina Harbor, Florida—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with the illustrations.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Petaluma Creek, California—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

A letter from the Secretary of War, recommending legislation to establish a system of discipline for the general hospital at Fort Bayard, N. Mex.—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of a joint resolution extending the time for the completion of the highway bridge across the Potomac—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from the committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 321) to provide for the extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence upon certain lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 291); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8984) to amend the laws governing labor or improvements upon mining claims in Alaska, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 292); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8965) to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers of the Confederate army and navy, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 294); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11783) for the establishment of town sites, and for the sale of lots within the common lands of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, in Oklahoma, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 295); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4468) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 296); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4470) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 297); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6451) granting an increase of pension to Adam Wucher, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 246); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CHANEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7418) granting an increase of pension to Fritz Miller, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 247); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3380) granting an increase of pension to George W. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 19, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, House bill No. 12076 was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The committee has directed me to report it back to the House and ask that it go to the Committee on Insular Affairs. Undoubtedly the mistake was made because of the title of the bill, which amends the act to temporarily provide revenue for the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes. The bill relates exclusively to "other purposes," which is civil government, and not to revenue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that reference of House bill No. 12076 be changed from the Committee on Ways and Means to the Committee on Insular Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 195) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Rhode Island, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks for change of reference of bill H. R. 195 from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was dischaged from further consideration of the bill (S. 21) granting a pension to Mary G. Bright, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 2082) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth T. Carpenter, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill No. 12320, making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Pending that motion, I would like to endeavor to make an agreement on the time for general debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, the Members on this side have had so little time to look into this bill that we are not prepared now to say if the debate shall be confined to one hour or to six hours, but I want to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] that within an hour after we get into the Committee of the Whole I think we can agree upon time.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the proposed arrangement there are one or two clauses in the urgent deficiency bill that we desire to take up at the time we reach them with the understanding, if it be agreeable, that we are to have on both clauses, one particularly in which I am interested, an hour at the time when it is reached, and not to be taken up in the general discussion.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We will have no trouble about that.

Mr. KEIFER. I am seeking, Mr. Speaker, to have the agreement on one clause, and that we shall have one hour to discuss it when it is reached in the pending bill, instead of under the five-minute rule. It is the clause in relation to paying the cost of transportation of silver coin by the Government.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the fullest discussion in connection with every item of this bill, but it seems to me at this time to make an agreement that there should be a general debate on any one clause extending over one hour is somewhat unnecessary. We will give all the time necessary to consider it. I hope it will not take an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. Then let it take such part of it only as is necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will give the gentleman any time he may desire to consider it. I hope it will not take an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. Then let it take such part of it only as is necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will give the gentleman any time he may desire.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think there will be no difficulty in the Committee of the Whole, when the item referred to by the gentleman from Ohio is reached, in giving him all the time he wants under that rule by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEIFER. If there is no objection, I am willing to leave it stand in that way.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 12320. Is there objection?

The motion of Mr. LITTAUER was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12320, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the urgent deficiency bill presented for the consideration of the committee this morning contains appropriations amounting to $15,215,503.75. A comparison with the amount carried in the urgent deficiency bill last session of $262,500 calls for some little explanation. In the second, or short, regular session of Congress the urgent deficiency bill contains only such items of great urgency as demand immediate attention on the convening of Congress in December. That bill usually passes the House before the holiday recess, and, of course, must be shortly thereafter followed by the general deficiency bill, which, in turn, must become law before the 4th of March. Consequently items of general deficiency not of extreme urgency are gathered together in the general bill. In the first, or long, session of Congress the general deficiency bill becomes a law, as is the custom, only in the very last days of the Congress, frequently at a time near the end of the fiscal year—I hope that will not be the case this year—leaving but a short time before the end of the fiscal year for which deficiencies make provision. Consequently in the first session of Congress the urgent deficiency bill contains all items of deficiency, urgent or otherwise, which have been presented to Congress through submission from the Departments, and hence the unequal comparison of figures first referred to. I would state, in addition, that the urgent deficiency bill of the first session of the last Congress carried an appropriation of little less than a million dollars more than the present bill.

Deficiencies considered in this bill cover practically the entire field of governmental expenditure with but very few exceptions, and yet they segregate themselves naturally into a few classes—four classes—three of which require but little scrutiny by your committee, while the fourth demands most exhaustive examination.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand the gentleman to say that this bill carries practically the same amount that was carried on the last bill of a similar character, on which a provision was made that there should not be any more deficiencies except where contracts or appropriations are made under existing law. I desire to ask the gentleman if the act of March 3, 1905, has been complied with by the various Departments?

Mr. LITTAUER. The act of March 3, 1905, will receive considerable consideration before we get through, but I would state, in answer to the gentleman's question, that we have in this bill a deficiency appropriation for the isthmian canal for the current year of $5,340,786.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to ask the gentleman one other question. In such instances as that law not being complied with, if there are such, has this other provision been complied with: "And all such appropriations shall be adhered to except when waived or modified in specific cases by written order of the Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure?"

Mr. LITTAUER. We have notices of such a thing in some instances.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one further question, following the exact words of the statute, in some instances you had and in others not. Let me read the act.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have the act.

Mr. HARDWICK—

And all such appropriations shall be adhered to except when waived or modified in specific cases by written order of the Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditures.

Was that done in each case?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was done in each case. It was developed in the hearings, and in our hearings we gave particular attention to that provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman take up that subject fully in the course of his remarks?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if he leaves out of this bill the fund to pay for the transportation of silver dollars?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is true the deficiency submitted for that purpose is omitted.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now, before the gentleman resumes his seat, I wish he would kindly tell us why that is done.

Mr. LITTAUER. Would not the gentleman permit me to suggest that we wait in our discussion until the time arrives when we will take that item up in the bill in the regular way? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has given notice that he desires to be heard on that subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is making a general statement about the bill, and explaining the bill, and I am in hopes that he will explain that also. It is a matter of considerable importance.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will proceed by stating that among these classes of deficiencies found in this bill are, first, deficiencies that arise from the operation of the statutes where the obligation to provide is positive under the law. There are many such items in this bill; for instance, to provide deficiencies for jurors in the United States courts, compensation provided by law; to provide deficiencies for fees and expenses of weighers, gaugers, and storekeepers in the internal-revenue service, whose employment is dependent on the number of distilleries in operation, and whose fees and expenses are authorized by law. Our work in connection with such deficiencies is simply to determine that there is deficiency under the law and then provide for it.

Next come deficiencies to cover judgments rendered against the United States and submitted to Congress according to law, from the Court of Claims and from the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, and Indian depredation claims. Our duty in connection with these is purely perfunctory; we simply look into the incidents of the judgment. I would call the attention of the committee to two judgments allowed this year that, perhaps, it is well to direct attention to. One is for $650,132 for royalties because of the use of the Harvey process in hardening steel armor plate, a judgment of the Court of Claims, confirmed by the Supreme Court, an indefinite naval expenditure that I trust will not often be repeated.

The other judgment is for $300,000 to the executors of the estate of the late Cornelius Vanderbilt, moneys paid under wrongful assessments of the inheritance tax—internal revenue.

Then comes a class which is termed "certified deficiencies"—deficiencies passed upon by the auditors of the various bureaus of the Government, and which come to us practically in the shape of judgments, and they are treated as such by your committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. In view of the act to which I have referred, have we a right to treat them as such, unless the chiefs of the bureaus authorize them?

Mr. LITTAUER. These judgments concern not the present year, to which the amendment to the Revised Statutes the gentleman refers to applies, but to years gone by. These certified deficiencies are of two classes. The first are deficiencies arising because of a lapse of unexpended appropriations of previous years—unexpended balances that have been covered into the Treasury. The committee will bear in mind that the "covering-in act" provides that an appropriation any part of which is unexpended two years after the fiscal year in which it was appropriated shall be covered into the Treasury, and that no claim for deficiency shall be allowed on account of that item unless by reappropriation. Then comes the other class of certified deficiencies, certification being made after the total amount of the appropriation has been exhausted. This seems to be the general practice of auditors, and I am advised has warrant in law. It has, however, appeared to me a very bad practice to permit auditors to pass upon accounts after the total amount of appropriation has been disbursed. It seems to me that deficiencies under such circumstances become nothing but mere claims.

Luckily, through the operation of the amendment to the statute made last year, such certification can not further recur. The limitation placed upon deficiencies in the last deficiency bill makes the expenditure of money for deficiencies illegal after an appropriation has been exhausted, and consequently the old practice, I am happy to say, must now come to an end. One of the auditors before us declared that, of course, such deficiencies could not be considered by any auditor in the future.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not this bill carry items that would be prohibited by the very law to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. LITTAUER. Wherever we found that the law applied, we dropped those items very quickly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman from New York allow an interruption?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In the bill, on page 34, there is an item like this: "To reimburse the postmaster at Tonopah and Goldfield, Nev., for expenditures for clerk hire, rent, fuel, lights," etc. That is not an appropriation for a deficiency already provided for by law, is it?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is an appropriation for an emergency, and it is an additional amount to be granted to men who have, under extraordinary circumstances, in order to conduct the public business, been compelled to pay out of their own pockets amounts that they seek to be reimbursed for.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have had a bill here ever since I came to Congress, unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims, to reimburse a man in Spokane for moneys paid out in this way on an emergency, and I would like to get it into this bill if possible.

Mr. LITTAUER. We then come to the important class of deficiencies, the largest in number, those toward which our examination must be most carefully and exhaustively directed, the class of anticipated deficiencies—amounts submitted to Congress from the different Departments and bureau chiefs needed and required to complete their work for the current fiscal year. Under this class of anticipated deficiencies has arisen a variety of abuses. Some of them are not only well defined, but very often repeated. They have crept into departmental management and into general conduct of expenditure. The principal abuse arises from the fact that the annual estimates are presented to Congress often in a careless, incomplete, and ill-considered condition, and that to such an extent that it has become a departmental custom as soon as an appropriation bill passes the House of Representatives for the Departments to scrutinize its items carefully in order to determine what further appropriations are needed, and then rush over to the Senate in their endeavor to have them included in the bill there, and their usual success there results in a long string of amendments when the bill is returned to the House for conference.

It is but frank to say that there seem to be in these anticipated deficiencies some items where committees of Congress, evidently with a view to keeping down the total amount of their bills to such sums as they believe Congress will want to allow, do not make proper provision for well-defined and almost necessary expenditure. Be these instances in the preparation of the bills as they may, when it comes to administration we have aggravations in the way of abuses of much more considerable character. We find that whenever we cut down or when generally we cut down the amounts estimated for for any given object to what, in the judgment of Congress, is ample provision for a given and specific work, those in charge of bureaus arbitrarily proceed to expend amounts under the appropriation as though their estimates had been allowed in full, giving no attention to the mandate contained in the appropriation determined by Congress. And then what happens? At the next session of Congress they come here with either an anticipated or an actual deficiency, and to our questions why, with good management, they could not have kept their expenditure within the limits set by Congress, they give us general and unsatisfactory reasons, but always wind up with the statement that unless this deficiency be allowed the work of the Government in relation thereto must stop.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. On page 46, line 16, I notice an item for payment for contesting seats in Congress in contest entitled "Koonce against Grady," act March 3, 1905, $1,000. When was this contest, and who is it gets the thousand dollars, Koonce or Grady?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am at a loss to answer that. It was an item that came to us under the head of audited claims and our attention was not particularly drawn thereto. I will look it up and let the gentleman know a little later.

Mr. JAMES. There was no such contest as that in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will look that up and let the gentleman know in a few moments.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York, in the line of his last statement that these Departments go right on expending the money without any reference to the appropriations made, on the basis of estimates given rather than the appropriations—I would like to inquire whether in the face of all these deficiencies the committee has been advised of what action the heads of these Departments took under the legislation of last winter, whether they furnished the committees with the necessary certificates that authorized these deficiencies?

Mr. LITTAUER. Wherever a waiver has been made we have been notified of it, and consequently have taken the item up. Because of the frequency of such waivers we propose now to amplify the law, and I will show the gentleman from Maine how we mean to do it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I notice the amendment, and I think it is apt for that purpose, but I would like to make this further inquiry: Do I understand that all the items included in this bill are items that have been——

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. This dialogue is doubtless interesting, and we would like to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan rises to a point of order. The committee will be in order.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say for the information of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan that I understand the chairman of the committee is prepared in the general debate in connection with the amendment proposed to go into the matter about which I have been inquired in somewhat of detail, and I have no doubt all Members of the House are very anxious to get information, and I will not further insist upon questions at this time.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, this continual practice of carelessly considered estimate, anticipated deficiency granted, followed by certified claims, etc., has been permitted to grow to such an extent until it had practically become a custom in the Departments to pay little or no attention to amounts appropriated. In other words, bureau chiefs were following out their own sweet will and their judgment as to expenditures and were not being confined at all by the limitation set upon appropriations by Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to a statement which I read in a newspaper and which he will no doubt recognize, if it were a true statement. It was stated that one of the chiefs of divisions, perhaps who was supporting a deficit of $5,000 in the last appropriation bill, not in this one, was inquired of how they came to expend that money. His statement was that they needed it, and he said that they had estimated for the whole amount of it and that Congress arbitrarily cut it down and that they went forward and spent the money. I would like to know of the gentleman if that is a fact.

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me I remember that very instance in connection with the printing of a very elaborate volume, which was afterwards taken out of the hands of the Department.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I suppose under our admirable system of appointment for life that gentleman is still holding the position?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; he has been appointed to Calcutta. This custom had gone on to such an extent that we had such aggravating examples as the gentleman from Ohio has just referred to before us, so that in the last session your Committee on Deficiencies determined to amend the law, or, rather, to amplify it, though it appeared plain to us that statute 3697 ought to have covered and prevented such a practice. The old statute, which is found on the fourth page of the report, provided that—

> No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year and involve the Government in any contract or obligation for the payment of money in excess of such appropriation unless such contract or obligation be authorized by law.

This statute became observed, as far as we could find out, generally in the breach, and we determined to do what we could, even though it be of drastic fashion, to put an end to this system of coercive deficiencies, and for that purpose amended the law. We fixed the penalties for its violation as removal from office, fine, or imprisonment, providing in part that—

> All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotment as to prevent undue expenditures in one portion of the year that may require deficiency or additional appropriation to complete the service of the year, and all such apportionments shall be adhered to.

Providing further for a waiver of this restriction only when, in the judgment of a head of a Department it became necessary. In our hearings this year it developed that for the first time bureau chiefs realized that Congress meant to insist that its appropriations should be followed and not exceeded; that it meant to take back control of appropriations into its own hands.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman, do I understand him to say that that statute which he has just referred to is continued to be violated and is now violated by the heads of bureaus notwithstanding the admonition of Congress?

Mr. LITTAUER. I meant to say the old statute, not as it was amended last year, but in previous years when the statute did not provide penalties for its violation of dismissal from office, fine, or imprisonment. Then the statute was practically a dead letter.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, is the amended statute now being violated?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe the amended statute is being followed about as closely as a new statute can be followed.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that, in the judgment of the committee, it is not being violated in the letter, but it is being evaded in spirit, and we propose to amend so as to prevent that evasion.

Mr. CLAYTON. You propose to amend it so as to prevent evasion in the future?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Why, this practice became so thoroughly settled in the Departments that some of them can hardly realize to this day that we enacted a new law last year controlling their former practices, and I have before me a submission for an actual deficiency for 1905 and an anticipated deficiency for 1906 from the State Department, one of the worst offenders in the past, which reads as follows:

It—

> respectfully urges that the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905, should not apply to the contingent expenses of the diplomatic and consular service, if it were the intention of Congress that it should.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield for a question? The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has just stated that the law was evaded. You are trying to prevent that hereafter?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a clause in the law that I will explain to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who evaded it, and why?

Mr. LITTAUER. As the law now stands, it is within the privilege of a head of a Department to waive the limitation placed in this act, when in his judgment it should be waived. We felt there might grow up a custom under that privilege of waiver that we wanted to control, as far as good administration would permit us, and consequently we offer in this bill the following amendment, which I think will well serve our purpose:

> All such apportionments shall be adhered to and shall not be waived or modified except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance, which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment.

And it further declares that—

> In case said apportionments are waived or modified as herein provided the same shall be waived or modified in writing by the head of such Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure, and the reason therefor shall be fully set forth in each particular case and communicated to Congress in connection with estimates for any additional appropriation required on account thereof.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I infer from the proposed law that some Department has considered that these extraordinary occasions have arisen which would excuse them for evading the law. What were those extraordinary occasions?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, under existing law it is competent for a departmental officer to waive the apportionment for any cause or for any reason, but he must in that case submit to Congress the reasons for the waiver. Now, the defect in the existing law is that it does not define the ground upon which the right of waiver may be exercised, and we proposed to define that ground by specifying that apportionments shall not be waived unless upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time the apportionment was made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman stated just now that the Department in some instances had evaded the law.

Mr. TAWNEY. The spirit of the law. I will answer the gentleman——

Mr. LITTAUER. Taking advantage of the waiver. Now, we have an item in this bill that perhaps will illustrate it. The Department of Justice has an account for miscellaneous expenditures. A waiver was made under that account.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is that item?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is the item on page 28.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is it?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will just describe it to the gentleman. The miscellaneous expenditure account was large enough for its regular purpose, but the Attorney-General waived it in order that a portrait of the late Attorney-General might be paid for out of that fund.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much did it cost?

Mr. LITTAUER. It cost $2,615.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He evaded the law to buy a picture costing that amount?

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not answer that question. We have inserted a provision in this bill that this waiver is not to be made or appropriation modified except on the happening of some extraordinary emergency.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that is an extraordinary emergency, the buying and hanging anybody's picture in the Attorney-General's office?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not. I do not think that hereafter the Attorney-General will do that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who was he?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was in the year 1906.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the House will approve of this further limitation. In order that the House may regain its control over appropriations, which evidently has lapsed, and in order that the Departments may understand that such moneys, and such moneys alone as we appropriate, will be at their service to carry on the work of the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish the distinguished gentleman who is making such an able and plain statement of the bill should take particular cognizance of what is an extraordinary occasion in the mind of the Attorney-General, to wit, to putting up a picture of an Attorney-General in his office.

Mr. LITTAUER. The present law does not require an "extraordinary" occasion. I thought I made it plain that in the amendment we insert in the clause we curtail this privilege in the future in order that it may cover extraordinary occasions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And this is a sample of an extraordinary occasion, ordering and paying for this picture.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Tennessee does not yet understand that the present law says nothing about extraordinary occasions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is explaining to us what was an extraordinary occasion and gave that as an item where the Department had evaded the law.

Mr. LITTAUER. But it is proposed now to amend that.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York was just trying to show to the House that the committee was proposing to amend the law so that no such condition could arise except on extraordinary occasions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And cited this as an instance of an extraordinary occasion.

Mr. LITTAUER. I stated this instance as one of those modifications of the law, and I state that in the future the law will curtail that as far as good administration of the Department will permit; and in curtailing it we refer as plainly as our language will permit us to do so "that hereafter there shall be no waiver or modification except upon some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance."

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not the invariable custom to have portraits of the going-out Attorney-General painted and hung in the Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, if it is, Congress ought to appropriate for that portrait, and not appropriate for it in a miscellaneous expenditure without knowing what that miscellaneous expenditure covers. I was trying to bring the attention of Congress to the fact that it is our fixed purpose to state the purpose of this deficiency, and we appropriate specifically for it.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. All that might be; but if it is a custom to paint these portraits when the case arises, whether from the decease or resignation of an Attorney-General, would it not be considered an extraordinary occasion, owing to the custom of the Department, to paint this portrait?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think so, and it can not occur in the law as we seek to amend it. Under the law as it stood when it was ordered it was a proper order, in the judgment of the Attorney-General.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That is what I am trying to develop, and I must say that I think the gentleman has been unfortunate in giving an illustration or example of the operation of the law.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman tell us how they paid for it and what reason they have given? The gentleman has characterized it as an evasion of the law.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not at all. They have simply paid it out, and I give it as an illustration of a case now permitted under the law, and properly so, and which we hope in the future to curtail by an amendment which we are offering to this bill.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman was asked to please name one of these evasions, and he did so.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman must remember when the apportionment was waived under the existing law they could expend that for any contingent expense that, in the judgment of the Attorney-General, was legitimate.

Mr. SIMS. And cited this as an instance of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman from Minnesota wherein this law has been evaded, and the gentleman from New York gave this picture item as an example of evasion.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not call it evasion in that sense.

Mr. LITTAUER. It would be an evasion if the present bill passes. Then it would be an evasion.

Mr. SIMS. We are dealing with the subject of evasion.

Mr. TAWNEY. He did not make it that broad.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that the expenditure of these amounts of money in the cases of appropriation was an evasion of the spirit, at least, of the act of 1905.

Mr. LITTAUER. In the first place, it was an expenditure in excess of the apportionment made under the appropriation, and the law as it reads was as follows:

> Except when waived or modified in specific cases by the written order of the head of the Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure.

So it gave the head of this Executive Department the right to waive any provision whenever he wanted to.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will not the gentleman concede that if the head of the Department waived the apportionment to such a purpose it was an evasion of the spirit of the act of 1905?

Mr. LITTAUER. I regret that so much has been made of this particular item. I simply brought it up to show why we felt from our hearings and the development of the matters brought before us that we should circumscribe the waivers more than does the present law. Now, the Attorney-General in waiving this is positively within the law.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that the best way to impress upon the heads of the Departments the fact that Congress has legislated upon this subject would be to omit making appropriations for some of these items in which they have violated, if not the letter, at least the spirit of the law?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is precisely what we have done in this bill where we have felt that the spirit of the law was violated.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Are there not many items in the bill where you make appropriations where the apportionment has been waived?

Mr. LITTAUER. There are instances, and we have felt that they were justified in making them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My information is that the expense for this portrait was charged up to the contingent fund, and it created a deficiency in it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Let me read to you:

> DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
> Washington, December 11, 1905.
> The apportionment of the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Department of Justice, miscellaneous items, 1906," for the month of July, 1905, is hereby waived, for the reason that under my direction there was paid therefrom the cost of a portrait of ex-Attorney-General P. C. KNOX, now United States Senator.
> W. H. MOODY, Attorney-General.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the picture should have been put in the office; that is right and proper; but the law should not have been evaded, if it were, by taking public funds that were not appropriated to do this particular thing.

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me the action of the committee is worthy of being upheld. We have a good deal of this oil-painting business going on about the Departments. We know that in the House when we want to hang the picture of a Speaker in the Hall we contribute ourselves.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman state who the artist was that received this $2,600?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman does not know whether it was a famous artist or not.

Mr. LITTAUER. No. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to everything I desire at this time, with the exception that we have omitted from this bill a great variety of items, the total amount of which is $2,592,320; and that we have followed the uniform custom of the Committee on Appropriations to include no claim, nothing except deficiencies that have been audited, even though they be recommended by the head of a Department. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE].

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to some of the items in this bill that strike me as being a little peculiar and worthy of challenge in the Committee of the Whole. In the first place, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] that there should really be no deficiencies in the appropriations for the present year. Under the existing law it is really difficult to understand how the heads of the different Departments of this Government could have a deficiency in their respective Departments without subjecting themselves to the serious penalties imposed by the law, passed by this House a year ago, which not only provides for the dismissal from office in the event of a deficiency, but also for fine and imprisonment besides.

Notwithstanding the severe penalties imposed by that statute, we find this year the usual deficiencies in the Departments have come to this House, and in many instances we find them absolutely increased over a year ago. This condition Congress has attempted in the past to regulate and control. They hope to be able to control it in the future by offering to the House an amendment to the statute which I hope will be adopted, and which I believe will be productive of much good if it is adopted. Yet, at the same time, my experience in the past thoroughly convinces me, and I believe now that a year hence we shall be confronted by our same old friend, the urgent deficiency bill, probably in the same form that it appears to us now. It is nothing less than a reckless, extravagant, and in many instances a criminal expenditure of public money that can find no justification either here or elsewhere.

But one of the great questions that Congress has got to deal with is whether or not the heads of the different Departments of this Government shall control Congress and go on making expenditures in excess of appropriations and in violation of law, or whether Congress will assert its rights and give the different heads of the Departments of this Government to understand that when they have once appropriated such funds as they deem necessary for the defraying of the expenses of this Government that Congress means what it says, and those appropriations shall not be exceeded except in cases of extraordinary emergencies.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman how he would suggest that Congress shall make its desire known to these Departments that they shall keep within the appropriations made by Congress?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. There is but one way on earth that I know of. Congress has heretofore, as I have stated, a year ago, passed an act making it both a crime and removal from office with fine and imprisonment, and now finds that there has been a violation of that law by almost every head of the Departments of this Government. The only thing to do in my judgment is to refuse to make the appropriation where they have expended money in excess of that authorized by law.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then the law has been violated flagrantly.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Undoubtedly, and has been so admitted.

Mr. CLAYTON. And yet there have been no prosecutions, and no removals from office?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. No; and there are not likely to be any.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the only remedy the gentleman thinks that Congress has is to withhold these deficiency appropriations.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Yes; where they have been made directly in violation of the statute law.

Mr. WANGER. Does the gentleman advocate the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee, or does he favor an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I am decidedly in favor of the amendment offered by the committee, and I will say to the gentleman that I also favor, if this practice is continued beyond this point (and I would not hesitate to vote for it now), a refusal of the House to appropriate money to meet expenditures where they have been made in violation of the statute.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let me ask the gentleman one more question. Could not a further remedy be made if Congress should deprive the heads of these Departments of all discretion, such as has been mentioned here during the progress of this debate, and allow them to expend no money for any purpose except that specifically appropriated for that particular purpose?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] that that is practically the law now.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; but Congress provides and has been providing in the bills carrying these appropriations that this provision of law can be suspended in the discretion of the head of the Department.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. But that was in case of emergency only. Of course this House under no circumstances could undertake to say, or would undertake to say, that such an emergency might not at some time arise in some Department that would justify it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Who is to be the judge of the emergency?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Undoubtedly that must be left to the head of the Department.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then it is left to his discretion?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. To be reviewed by Congress.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. To be reviewed, of course, by the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the gentleman is of the opinion that this abuse in the particular about which we are talking will continue in the future as it has in the past.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. The gentleman does not quite understand me. I do not complain so much of the abuse of the law as I do of the utter failure to comply with the law at all. And this, I fear, will continue.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] will understand that Congress has no power to dismiss the head of a Department from office. That properly belongs to those who are charged with the responsibility of enforcing the law as they find it on the statute books, and that branch of it belongs to the Judiciary Department of this Government. And, in my judgment, every officer whose duty it is to enforce the law ought to be held to the strictest account.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is the head of a Department to whom the gentleman alludes—who is he in person?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, the gentleman understands I am not alluding to any particular Department—the head of the Agricultural Department, the head of the Navy Department, the head of the War Department, the State Department—the heads of all the Departments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What do you mean by "the head of the Navy Department," or War Department—the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You do not allude to subordinates at the head of the different Departments?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I do not understand subordinates are charged with the disbursing of this money or any part of it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Moreover, the waiver must be by the Secretary.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. But no dismissals have occurred and, in the opinion of the gentleman, none will occur?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The law provides that the head of the Department may make this waiver.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. The head of the Department may make a waiver of the apportionment provided by Congress and extend it beyond the appropriation to meet an emergency.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is that in the statute or is that the construction of the law by the head of a Department?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. That is the law now and this amendment seeks to strengthen it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just one other question and I have finished. As a matter of fact, was the money for the purchase of this Knox picture actually paid before it was reported to Congress?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, I understand it was; I will come to that a little later on. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and which, in my judgment, needs rectifying, and needs it badly, at our hands. This committee felt itself not vested with the power to incorporate into this bill any statute or any change of existing law that would effect a remedy, but it has been made apparent to the committee that during the last year this Government expended the sum of $900,000 for the transportation alone of coal from this country to the Philippine Islands—a vast sum, indeed. When questioned for information as to why this enormous expenditure was made and this wonderful increase, we supposing, of course, that it might have come from the fact that we had thoroughly stocked all places with coal in our foreign possessions, we learned that such was not the case, but that on account of an act passed by Congress a year ago requiring and directing coal shipped to our insular possessions to be shipped in American bottoms—a bill that undoubtedly appealed to this House as the means of protecting American industries, a bill intended to encourage home shipowners, a bill intended to encourage our own people, a bill intended to give to them an advantage over the foreigner, innocent in its appearance, apparently fair upon its face, a bill that appealed to the Americanism of every man in this House—and yet the fact has developed and remains undisputed that prior to the passage of this bill this Government had been shipping coal in foreign bottoms to the Philippine Islands at a cost of $4.50 a ton. Immediately after the passage of the bill requiring it to be shipped in American bottoms the price rose and has remained ever since that day not less than $7.50 a ton, or $3 increase in the price of transportation of a ton of coal from the United States to the Philippine Islands by reason of the law requiring it to be transported in American bottoms. We expended last year for that purpose alone more than $900,000. This bill carries to-day an appropriation for the same purpose of $500,000, and that no doubt will be inadequate to meet the expense.

This statute, in my judgment, needs to be repealed. The interests of the taxpayers of this Government demand when we are shipping coal from this country for the use of the American Navy we should ship it as cheaply as possible [applause on the Democratic side], and especially in view of the fact that up to this time no coal has been discovered upon the Philippine Islands and the information is that none will be discovered suitable for the use of the Navy while it is in the waters adjacent to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to know who was benefited by that large increased cost per ton of shipping coal to the Philippines?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Why, the few owners, undoubtedly, of the American ships; certainly nobody else.

Mr. GOULDEN. Well, it went to Americans and American industries, then.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. It did, but we were paying them $3 a ton more for transportation than we were paying to foreign bottoms. For myself I am opposed to it; I do not know how the gentleman may stand.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am in favor of encouraging American shipping, but not by a direct subsidy or bounty.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Who was it paid by?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. It was paid directly by the Navy Department.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It was paid by Americans as well as to them.

Mr. GOULDEN. The bill came through my committee, that is why I ask the question.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. The gentleman is correct in assuming that a few Americans were benefited, and I presume we will continue that benefit to a favored few at the expense of the great mass of the American people. This is a subsidy pure and simple and of the worst kind. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I love Americans and am proud of the fact that I am an American citizen, but I frankly state that I have no respect for any American who takes advantage of his position to fleece his Government.

There is one other matter worthy of note. This bill carries an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the collection of the internal revenues of this country.

Mr. Chairman, that branch of this Government is likewise not free from criticism, it is not free from fault in my humble and candid opinion. It is disclosed by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which has recently been issued, and can be had by each and every Member of this House, and has been sent them, that in connection with the internal revenue of this country this Government is engaged in a transaction that absolutely staggers with awe and astonishment the average business man of this or any other country. Fifty-one ports of collection to-day established and in full operation in this country, for which Congress is annually making an appropriation to defray the expenses of, are expending more money than their receipts amount to. If the sum expended was simply trival, if the discrepancy was simply slight, it would cut, in my judgment, but little figure. But such is not the case.

Let me call the attention of the House to a few of the most striking and startling places where this expenditure exceeds the receipts. For instance, at Albemarle, N. C., the amount collected by the United States Government for the last fiscal year was a total sum of $5. In order to collect this $5 it cost the people of this Government $1,660.04, or $321 for every dollar that we collected. At Annapolis, Md., this Government collected for the past fiscal year $5 more, and in order to collect it we expended nine hundred and twenty-nine dollars and a few cents.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman from Arkansas prepared to offer a remedy for that?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Absolutely. I will come to that later on.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That we abolish those ports?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If those ports were abolished what would prevent goods from being smuggled into this country through them, and thus defeat the Government out of tariff revenues?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Simply this: Let the officers at the adjoining or nearest port see to it, by some agent that may be sent there at the proper time, that the law is not violated.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will it not require the constant attendance of some officer at one of these ports in order to prevent smuggling?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. In my judgment, absolutely no.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at Barnstable, Mass., this Government collected last year $438.80, and in order to collect that we paid $3,532. At Beaufort, N. C., for the last fiscal year this Government did not collect one cent of internal revenue. The governmental expenditures at that point were $1,400.01, and we did not get a cent in return. At Castine, Me., we collected $47.10 at the cost of $382.77. At Easton, Md., we collected $57.10, and to do so we paid out $2,402.18. At Wolfboro, Me., we collected $2,029, which cost this Government $6,891.75. At Aquina, Oreg., we did not collect a cent, at a cost to the Government of $1,040.75.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. As I understand the gentleman's position, he desires to abolish those ports because so little money is collected at such great cost. Now, suppose he would apply the same principles to the star route post-offices; what does he think would become of them?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, but the gentleman can not apply this to the same plan as that of the post-offices. A post-office becomes a necessity because of the fact that it is useful to the people of the country. This is not a necessity—never has been a necessity—and it serves no other or more useful purpose than the employment of a few governmental agents at the Government's expense, who have absolutely not a thing on earth to do, not even to the writing of their names or the signing of a report. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This particular character of Government graft might well be dispensed with.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and that is, if he ever heard of a post-office being maintained where a letter was never received or mailed?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I never did. It would be abolished long before it reached that stage.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But the gentleman has heard of a great many of them that did not pay and were maintained.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, certainly; and ought to be maintained.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him and ask him if he knows of a single post-office, I do not care how inferior, whose postmaster receives any salary whatever except what he gets by the cancellation of stamps in that office?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If you abolish the Albemarle district and Beaufort post-offices——

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I do not want to abolish their post-offices.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I meant custom-houses, of course, in North Carolina. My information is that the nearest custom-house would be 200 miles from Beaufort Harbor, and under the gentleman's plan an officer would be sent from there to Beaufort.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I said an agent could be sent there.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Well, does the gentleman think that an agent living 200 miles away could maintain such supervision over the entrances into that harbor as to prevent smuggling?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I certainly do, where the receipts at that port do not exceed $5; I do not care whether the agent is 200 or 500 miles away.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It might be, if you had no agent there, thousands of dollars' worth of goods might come in unlawfully. They would be slipped in.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Then the gentleman ought to change the law, and instead of providing for a collector of revenue at these ports, provide for men to be placed at certain given points to prevent the smuggling of goods into this country.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That would not be practicable. Frequently we maintain guards around some valuable treasure at enormous expense, yet we have no injury. We expend millions for protection, when, as a matter of fact, we lose nothing, from the fact that we are protecting the property.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. So far as that is concerned, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that is only a supposition. It has never been demonstrated, that I have ever seen or heard of, that such a condition of affairs ever existed, or was likely ever to exist. It has never been shown that these agents by remaining at these ports have saved the Government any considerable sum of money or any money at all by their presence, and until that has been demonstrated I for one am certainly opposed to paying $1,400 to maintain a collector at a port where the total receipts are only $5 a year.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I agree with the gentleman that the expense ought to be diminished. I think an officer to do the proper duties there could be obtained for less than the present expense.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I express the hope, Mr. Chairman, to this House that there will be incorporated in this bill accompanying this appropriation of $1,500,000 and passed by the House a provision that no part of this sum shall be either used or expended at any port of the United States where the expenditure exceeds the receipts for the past fiscal year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to my colleague that the objection raised by the gentleman from North Carolina does not hold good? If the custom-house is abolished no goods can be brought into the town unlawfully, because the mayor of the town will control that; but there are coastwise ships coming in and going out that must have clearances. They can not get clearances without an official. Therefore when you abolish the ports to which reference is made there must be a deputy collector or a deputy agent to give clearance to the ships ligitimately going there.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are fifty-one of these ports, and I shall ask, without taking the time to read them, that I may have permission to have a list of them printed with my remarks in the RECORD.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the gentleman sits down I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the report of the Secretary of the Treasury show how many people are employed at these various ports?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, yes; running from two to fourteen at each one.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any information before the Appropriations Committee to justify employing such a large number of people where absolutely no business is done?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Only this: It is contended, along the line of the argument made or suggested by the questions of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], that there might be violations of the revenue law if they were not maintained there; but it is only a supposititious case.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. If it be true that only $5 or a less sum is collected in customs duties, it must also be true that there are no ships from foreign ports coming to these ports. Is that true?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there could not be any goods brought in, because there were no ships from foreign countries sailing to these ports.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Except that they anticipate that some might come in at some time in the future.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are two or three more items in this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the committee before I take my seat. In the original estimates submitted to your committee was a provision of $10,000 to pay a deficiency for transporting silver coin to the different banks of the country. That was reported to be necessary. The committee have seen fit to eliminate that and to strike it out. I hope to see that provision reinstated in this bill. I hope so for the reason that I believe it to be useful and beneficial. I believe it to be equitable and just. I am not unmindful of the fact that there is some reason and force in the argument made by certain members of the committee and certain Members of this House that the Government should not expend money to transport one particular coin of this Government or one particular class of money while it is refusing to do the same with all other classes of currency and coin issued by the United States Government. But for this particular expenditure, in my judgment, there is a good and valid reason that does not apply to gold coin or any other currency, and that is this: I live in a country using much silver. It is necessary for change.

During the period of the year when our farmers are engaged in gathering their cotton and marketing it the demand for the silver dollar, the half dollar, and the quarter, to use as a circulating medium for the purpose of furnishing necessary change to meet the demands of commerce in those particular parts of the country, almost exceeds the supply. A bank in a town where there is a subtreasury can and always has had the right to go to that subtreasury and acquire this change free of expense. This appropriation was intended to place banks situated in the interior and away from towns having subtreasuries upon an equal footing with those financial institutions that were so fortunate as to conduct their business in towns where subtreasuries are located, and where their wishes could be complied with without expense to them. In order to place all sections of the country upon an equal footing, North and South, East and West, in order to meet the demands made by commerce, in order to supply the needs of the people who are defraying the great expenses for maintaining this Government it was provided that the United States Treasury should pay the expense of transporting this change to the different banks of the country. Officials of the United States Treasury have stated before the committee that they believed this provision to be just and equitable. They believe it should be continued. They believe it in the interest of fairness and justice to the different sections of this Government; and as a further reason it has been pointed out to the committee that the United States Government for the past year made in the coinage of silver, by reason of its gains in the seignorage, more than a million dollars, or more than ten times the amount that it cost to transport this change to the different banks of the United States. This is the only money in existence to-day out of which the United States Treasury makes a profit and a gain by the coinage of it. The Government gains nothing by the coinage of gold or by the issuing of silver certificates or gold certificates, but in the coinage of silver the Government has a net profit annually to exceed a million dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad my friend is discussing that matter. I have been informed that the Committee on Appropriations have left out of this bill the usual appropriation to pay for the transportation of silver dollars. Now, is that——

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Silver coin generally—dollars, half dollars, quarters, and all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why are they doing that?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Because the majority of the committee believe that all of the money of this Government, gold and silver, should be placed upon the same footing under the law in the matter of transportation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have we not had a law since about 1873 as to minor coin and a law since 1857 as to the Mexican-Spanish coins that went into our money circulation?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I so understand it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is the way the statute reads, as I understand it.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no statute. It is just an annual appropriation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have had it, starting in 1857, as stated.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I have not looked up to see about the statute or the date of it, but I do know that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury before the committee testified that in making that shipment they were operating under existing law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course it is existing law. Now, they have been trying to get this appropriation cut out for ten years—ever since I have been in Congress—and your colleague, Mr. McRae, once told me that ever since he had been in Congress they had been trying to do the same thing, and yet Mr. CANNON, when he was chairman of the Appropriations Committee, never dropped it out. Now, why do you all drop it out?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. If it is dropped out, it will be dropped out over my protest and against my vote.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. CANNON was the head of your committee for a number of years and he always kept it in. Now, either he was unwise in leaving it in or you are unwise in cutting it out.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I hope to see the appropriation stay in the bill, for I believe it to be absolutely fair and just.

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to state, as bearing on the inquiry of my colleague, that since 1797 there has been a provision of law for the transportation of minor coin and subsidiary coin.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Arkansas permit me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I do not want to take too much of your time, but I want at this particular time to reply to a statement which I understand my friend from Arkansas made in his speech with reference to the abolition of certain customs ports.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Yes; I am sorry the gentleman was not here to hear what I said.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I was not in the Hall at the time. I want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that I have given that matter very full and careful investigation. I understand that, among other ports which the gentleman from Arkansas mentioned, he referred to the port of Beaufort, N. C.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That is one of the ports in my district. Now, I want to say to the gentleman that while the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury does show that, taking certain years, the expenditures exceed the receipts—I have forgotten the exact figures.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Are you referring to Beaufort, North Carolina or South Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. To Beaufort, N. C. Taking the receipts for a number of years, the Secretary in his report endeavors to show that the expense of collecting $1 is very much greater than the receipts. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas and to the House, from my investigation of the facts with reference to the port of Beaufort, in which I am particularly interested, and with reference to all these ports, that if you will take not one year or two years or a few years, but take a long series of years, it will be found that the expenses and receipts balance. For instance, if the gentleman will pardon me for one moment further, at the port of Beaufort there was on one occasion a cargo of railroad iron brought into that port, and the customs duties upon that cargo of iron alone were sufficient to pay the expenses of that port for a series of years; and, as stated on the floor of the House during the debate upon this same question in the last Congress by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the abolition of these ports or the putting of a deputy collector at these ports instead of a collector of customs would mean an encouragement to smuggling. Even if the expenses of these ports exceed the receipts for a series of years, I contend that it is to the interest of the Government that they should not be abolished, and that they should have a collector of customs there to prevent smuggling. That was the view taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], as I understand, in the last Congress.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. If the gentleman will pardon me for a moment, he will appreciate the fact that I do not care to yield to him to make a speech or argument in my time. He can do that in his own time.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I would not have interrupted him except to defend a port in my district.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. The gentleman can do that in his own time. The gentleman has stated that he has made a careful investigation of this port, and that while the receipts were sometimes less than the amount expended, yet that they would generally average up to about the same. I want to say to the gentleman, while I do not question his having scrutinized the matter and made a thorough investigation, I want to call his attention to the fact that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury says that during the past fiscal year not a single cent was collected at Beaufort, N. C., and there was an expense of $1,400 paid to two employees, or $700 apiece.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, that may be so, and yet my investigation shows that this does not apply to that port alone, and if you take a long series of years the receipts will about even up with expenses. And there are many duties imposed upon collectors of customs at Beaufort and similar ports besides collection of duties on imports.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow me to read one word from the statutes?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Yes; but let it be brief.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will now read the statute authorizing the shipment of this silver coin, so the gentleman will see that he is supported in his contention by the law as it was, and I never heard of its being repealed.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, I had no question about that. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee, however, for furnishing me with the citations from the statutes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the customs officers at these ports which he has enumerated have not other duties to perform in addition to the collection of customs duties? For instance, do not a great many vessels get their licenses at these ports, and are not the records kept there, and whenever there is a transfer of any vessel or an interest in any vessel is not the deed or other conveyance recorded at these offices?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. Similar questions have been asked before. I will say frankly that so far as the hearings before the committee revealed the fact it was not shown that they were maintained on account of any other business now in existence or heretofore existing. The different ports were maintained in anticipation that some crime might be committed, or for fear some party would violate the law in landing vessels and imports into the country. It was an anticipated necessity and not an actual necessity.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman pardon me again? I know, too, that there are subports of some of these offices, and that the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under a discretion vested in him, has frequently abolished some one or more of them, and that such action has been followed by their reestablishment in a very short time. The Treasury Department has been made to see that its action had worked a great injustice to a very large class of our most worthy citizens. In the cases I refer to it was shown that hundreds of masters of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade had been subjected to great hardship, to great cost and inconvenience. The gentleman knows, of course, that there are post-offices in the United States, maintained for the convenience of their patrons, that are not self-sustaining, and it is for the same reason that these small customs offices are maintained. No vessels engaged in our foreign trade ever go to these ports, but there are hundreds—yes, thousands—of small craft engaged in the coastwise trade, the records relating to which are kept in customs offices, which never collect a dollar of tariff duties simply because they are not located at great ports of entry. It is absolutely necessary that small customs offices shall be maintained for the convenience of the masters and owners of small craft engaged wholly in coastwise trade. The law requires that these vessels shall be licensed, that when transferred or mortgaged the evidence of such transfer or mortgage shall be recorded in the customs office of the district, and therefore it would be nothing less than an outrage to put customs offices only at ports of entry and at distant, inconvenient, and, in some instances, practically inaccessible points. A customs office, or at least a subport, may serve an indispensable purpose and yet not collect a dollar of public revenue.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia frankly, to create that necessity, he ought to be able to show that these men can not get their licenses from other ports where the receipts do exceed the expenses.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Does the gentleman think his statement is broad enough to admit of such an interpretation? Does the gentleman think the United States should require every owner of a vessel to procure a license, and then if he disposes of an interest in that vessel, that he shall be required to go in person—and I understand he has to go in person—and have the evidence of such transfer recorded in a customs office which is hundreds of miles away—thousands, if you please—because the establishment of such a rule as he would lay down would prevent there being one nearer?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. That is a contingency that will never arise.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understand the gentleman to hold that every vessel owner and master should be required to deal with the nearest customs port the customs duties collected at which make it self-sustaining, even if, in order to do so, he would be required to cross the continent.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. In view of the fact that we have so many of those ports that do pay expenses all over the country such a contingency as the gentleman speaks of would never occur.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I know of offices where vessel men would have to go 100 or 200 miles, even more than that, if required to go to a port at which customs duties are collected. There are customs offices located upon bays and rivers which could not be dispensed with without entailing great loss upon the masters and owners of the vessels owned in those localities, notwithstanding that they are not located at ports of entry for foreign-going vessels.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. And let me add that where the law requires them to take out licenses and transfers it is a hardship to compel them to travel even 100 miles.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Well, that is an honest difference between the gentleman and myself, and I take the other view of the case.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. In the State of California, at Monterey, they are developing very large oil fields, and they are shipping that oil direct to the Hawaiian Islands. They want to get a customhouse there or a subport of entry. At the present time the owners of the vessels engaged in the trade have to take their ships clean up to San Francisco to get a clearance. It is a very heavy expense. Does the gentleman think that Monterey ought to be denied a deputy collector, or something of that sort there, so that they can clear their vessels right from Monterey?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Unless it could be maintained without costing the Government from $500 to $1,400 for every dollar that was paid at that port, I undoubtedly do.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to suggest to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that there is not a scintilla of deficiency in this bill abolishing any port or regulating any port whatever.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, in that respect the bill in my judgment is defective. That is what I am talking about. There ought to be a provison in it to that extent.

Mr. FINLEY. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that, unless a port pays into the Treasury as much as the Government pays out for expenses, or approximately as much, it should be abolished?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. In my judgment, yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Has the gentleman considered the amount of exports from the number of these ports in many instances that they are very large, and is it not a fact that the fact that these ports do exist is an aid to commerce and to shipping to a very large amount and far in excess of any cost to the Government?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. In answer to that I will simply say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] that this committee had no information whatever as to the amount of goods exported from these several ports, but my information has always been that the total business done there, imports and exports, was exceedingly small indeed.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman is aware that on exports the Government receives nothing?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I understand that, and I would be very glad indeed to have the evidence of the amount of exports. I would say to the gentleman that I have before me evidence indisputable of the amount of imports, showing that it is nothing.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will take the ports on the Gulf, all of them, and on the Atlantic coast south of Norfolk, or including Norfolk, I think the gentleman will agree with me.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to call the attention of the committee and of the House to this matter, because I believed and I still believe it to be a useless and needless expenditure of public money.

Now, there is one other item that struck me with some force, provided for in this bill, and that is the item of $2,650 by which a deficiency was created in the United States Treasury, for the painting of a portrait of ex-Attorney-General P. C. Knox, and the present Attorney-General sends in to the committee the statement that he had that portrait painted of the ex-Attorney-General, who is now a Senator from the great State of Pennsylvania. I am aware of no law, I am advised of no provision of statute, that has ever authorized or ever should authorize the head of any one Department of this Government to have painted at the expense of the people of this country a portrait of the man whom he succeeded. It is, of course, a valuable contribution, no doubt, to the art of the country, for which we have paid the magnificent price of $2,650, and this for the portrait of the distinguished ex-Attorney-General, now the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. Does the gentleman not think that if we establish it as a precedent for this one that the present Attorney-General when he goes out of office can have his successor have one painted of him?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Oh, undoubtedly it will be done; but, Mr. Chairman, I say doubtless this may be a valuable contribution to the art of the country and to the people who are lovers of art; but to the plain, average citizen of the country, to the man who bears the burden of paying the taxes and paying the bills and standing the expense, it will be indeed hard for him to recognize the wisdom of this policy that authorizes the head of any Department to have painted in defiance of law, without authority, a portrait of the man whom he succeeds or the portrait of anyone else.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman if that is not subject to a point of order?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. It may be; but in this bill it is stipulated that this deficiency now exists because of the fact that the portrait has been painted—the money has been expended—therefore it is necessary that this House should provide for this $2,650 in order to make good the deficiency that now exists.

But, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the expenditure was made without authority of law when none existed or has existed, I sincerely hope and trust that this committee and this House will begin at some point at some time to give these gentlemen to understand this character of expenditure of public money does not now and will not in the future meet the approval of a majority of the Members sent to represent their constituents upon the floor of this House.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Now, may I ask the gentleman if this item is not subject to the point of order; if there is no existing law providing for it?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I think the gentleman is correct. At the same time it is distinctly shown that the money has already been expended by the present Attorney-General of this Government. But, Mr. Chairman, whether the item is subject to the point of order or not, I hope and trust that it may be stricken from this bill, and I believe it will be the part of wisdom to do it, or otherwise a practice that is, in my judgment, both vicious and extravagant will neither be stopped nor checked. So long as expenditures of public funds are made in keeping with this item, so long as the revenues of the country are thus expended, it may be to gentlemen of this House no matter of astonishment or surprise that great public utilities and necessities, like the building and construction of public buildings that are needed in every State of this Union, must go unbuilt and undone. Rivers of the United States must go on choked with their own sand, unimproved, not taken care of, in order that wild, extravagant, and useless expenditures of public money can thus be carried on year after year. Honest indebtedness—claims that this Government has owed and been owing for more than forty years, the justice of which has never been questioned and the correctness of which has never been doubted—must remain unpaid because we are told that we must have economy in the expenditure of public money, and yet, Mr. Chairman, while that condition of affairs exists we find the most outrageous, flagrant, extravagant expenditure of public funds carried on through every Department of this Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I ask for a few minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other item in this bill to which I desire to direct attention. This bill carries with it an appropriation of $5,340,000, I believe, to be expended for the Panama Canal, and it must be understood that this is in addition to the $50,000,000 spent in the beginning. It has been the hope of myself, and especially the Members of the South and a majority of the Members of this House, that we might witness some speedy construction of this great canal that meant so much to the commerce of this country and its business interests, but it must come to every gentleman as it has come to me as a matter of some regret and surprise to know that when this sum of money shall have been appropriated and spent we shall have expended more than $26,000,000 in Panama draining sloughs, digging ditches, but not canals; building sidewalks, paving streets, building hotels, fighting mosquitoes, and constructing waterworks, trying to improve the health conditions in Panama so that somebody can live there long enough to engage in the building of it, and yet when this $76,000,000 shall have been expended we are only given the hope that they will then have progressed far enough and only far enough to be able to determine what character of canal we will have. If, Mr. Chairman, it takes $76,000,000, if it takes a year in the future to reach the point where this Government shall determine only what character of canal we are to have, whether a sea level or lock and dam, then, in my judgment, the child is not yet born who will live long enough to witness any substantial headway made in the completion of the Panama Canal. After spending $76,000,000 not one shovel of dirt has been thrown—rather a discouraging situation, indeed. I do not believe that this bill is the proper place where this appropriation should be made. It is here. I do not question the existing law. I doubt if it is subject to a point of order, yet, at the same time, for myself I would have preferred that this appropriation had been made in an entirely different way and manner.

There is just one other great question demanding attention at our hands to which I desire to direct attention before I conclude my remarks, and that is the public demand made upon this Congress that we shall without delay revise in a proper manner the present schedules of the Dingley tariff law. The pressing necessity for such revision is now almost universally admitted, and if we could only do this and then succeed in passing a bill to regulate and control the charges of railroads so as to make them do equal justice to all sections and classes, we would go down in history as having done more good for the country generally than any other Congress that has assembled here in the past twenty years. Mr. Chairman, when we recall to mind the recent utterances of the President upon this subject of tariff revision, both in his speeches and through the public press, it is to me a matter of sincere and genuine regret that in his recent message to Congress he did not see proper to call attention to the pressing necessity for such legislation. Can it be possible that those favoring the stand-pat policy, by which we are given to understand that the great army of consumers must go on and continue to submit to being robbed, have scored a victory over such a bold and strenuous a personage as the present occupant of the White House? While fearing the worst, let us still hope that such is not the case.

The present tariff law is the most unjust and unequal measure that has ever disgraced the statutes of this Government, for not only is it unequal, but in its operation it absolutely becomes sectional; it affords ample protection to one section of the country while it withholds it from another. For instance, the wheat grower of the North and of the East has the products of his farm protected from any kind of outside competition by a tax of 25 cents a bushel on wheat; the corn raisers of the North and West are likewise protected by a tax of 15 cents a bushel on corn and 20 cents a bushel on meal. But how fares the cotton planter of the South? He is forced to sell the products of his fields in the open markets of the world and in competition with every other country known. As a consequence millions of dollars' worth of cotton is being annually imported into the United States and sold in our markets, and, in addition to this, he is forced to pay a tax of six-tenths of a cent per yard on all the bagging he wraps his cotton with and five-tenths of a cent per pound on all the ties he ties it with. Since the passage of this law in 1897 the cotton planters of the South have been forced to contribute annually to the bagging and tie trust over $1,500,000. If such unjust and unreasonable exactions as these should be made upon all sections and all farmers alike, does any sane man believe for one moment that it would stand for one single year? I do not, and in behalf of my people I now protest against the heavy and unreasonable burdens it places upon them. I hope the day is not far distant when we shall come out into a sweeter, purer, and better atmosphere, when every American citizen shall enjoy equal rights and advantages, with special privileges to no class or section. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. LIVINGSTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rose for the purpose of being recognized to make a few remarks on the items of the bill being discussed on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio at another time. The gentleman from Georgia, the senior member of the minority on the Committee on Appropriations, is now recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Coming back, Mr. Chairman, to the abuse of appropriations by the Departments and Government officials, I want to make this suggestion:

The Departments are not alone to blame for the custom that has grown up, of overreaching appropriations made by Congress. Since my connection with the committee, fifteen or sixteen years, we have often encouraged rather than discouraged deficiencies. It was a well-recognized fact for years that if we wanted to make an impression of economy, or if we had a short session and were in a great hurry, we cut appropriations rather than investigated them and said: "Oh, well; they could go to the Senate or they could come in with a deficiency." It was understood in the Departments that they could come with a deficiency, and the custom has grown up until it has become a part of our system. The Departments have become the appropriating authorities, and all the committee has had to do for the last few years is to write in the bill whatever they may estimate as deficiencies. We had a clause a year ago put into the law, section 3679, to remedy this evil, but we discovered that it did not remedy it. It is quite a lengthy provision, but the sum and substance of it is this——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman to ask him if he thinks the practice to which he has just referred is good practice, and one that ought to be adhered to?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman mean the practice——

Mr. CLAYTON. Of encouraging, as the gentleman said, these Departments to expend money without an appropriation, and then have the Committee on Appropriations come in and make it up by way of a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, Mr. Chairman, I not only do not think that proper, but I think it is dangerous, and tends to extravagance. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for an appropriation committee to be hurried upon a bill that carries millions and millions of dollars if you want good service. The Department of War and the Department of the Navy have millions of dollars involved in a bill. How can you tell where to cut and what amount should be cut unless you pay attention to every single item in the bill and understand the whole administration of the Department? Now, that grows partly out of your short session, which Congress should remedy. This country has become too large, its business too large, for any two months and a half or three months' session of Congress. A great many of these deficiencies come in that way, because you hurry your committee, you hurry the House, you hurry the Senate, and you must get through by the 4th of March, as a matter of course; and then a great many of these deficiencies have been encouraged by the practice of the committee and by the practice of the House or the Senate of saying, "We have not time to take it up now; come in with your deficiency." Your committee endeavored a year ago, and the House indorsed the action, to stop it. The provision that was passed did not stop it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think the gentleman will be satisfied if he will let me go on a minute further. As I said, the provision did not stop it, and it was not only not stopped, but it was evaded. And it will be evaded again, in my opinion.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the gentleman has said. The Constitution, however, provides that Congress shall meet on the first Monday in December and the Congress expires by limitation on the 4th of March. Now, how would the gentleman meet that constitutional provision?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Constitution says, Mr. Chairman, Congress shall meet on the first Monday in December until otherwise ordered. You have nothing to do but pass a simple resolution or bill changing the dates. That is what you have to do, and is what you should do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In regard to the question the gentleman was discussing a moment ago, I will say that the House did, with remarkable unanimity, indorse that reform measure of last winter. The House had witnessed the crying evil of which the gentleman has been speaking—the administration of the law in the Departments, or rather its nonadministration—and, notwithstanding the condemnation of that evil, now, as I understand the gentleman, he says the officers down there deliberately and persistently disobeyed not only the law we enacted last fall, but they otherwise have done wrong—evaded the law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I did not use the language the gentleman from Tennessee has used. That is, in effect——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what the gentleman meant to say, was it not?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I said this, that it did not stop the abuse. The present law has not effected what we supposed it would. I did say, in my opinion, in instances it was purposely evaded. We have evidence of that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you give the evidence of that?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have. I do not like to be personal. Mr. Chairman, it is an absolute necessity. To begin with, we must give deliberation, not only in the committee room, but on this floor, and you do not do it, and you know you do not do it; and there is no use blaming everything on the Departments. We have had this bill for twelve days, I think, before the committee, and perhaps we have given more thought to it than any bill for years. We have stricken out two and a half millions of money, and the question to-day is whether some of it ought not to have been given. You do not know, and this House will not try to know. Suppose there ought to be put in this bill an amount that you do not put into it, and it passes that way, and you put this rule on the heads of the Departments, why, you see, at once there is a corresponding obligation upon the Appropriations Committee and upon the House to put into the bill everything the heads of the Departments ought to have and must have. If you will do that to start with, and then put this rule on them, you can not make it too stringent; but if we are to slash and cut indiscriminately without judgment and then put this rule on the Departments and hold them down to it, why the administration of the Government in the various Departments must suffer and will suffer. I think, Mr. Chairman, the language we have adopted in this report made to the House will come nearer to correcting the abuse than the language in the old measure. I wish to say that I do not think it will completely do it. The abuse has grown from year to year until it is as strong as the Department and more powerful than your committee and more powerful than the House and Senate combined. I do not know whether this measure will do it or not. It is an experiment; it may do it, it may not do it.

Now, take the agricultural appropriation. I do not remember the page in the printed bill. I take the copy of the bill we passed in the committee room. They made a deficiency of $135,000 and sent it over to the committee. The chairman of the committee immediately wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Department, wanting to know if, under the rule, he made that allotment, or if he did not make that allotment, who did make it; and if he did make it, if he made it in a certain prescribed manner, why he did not live up to it. He wrote the same letter to other Departments. What do you suppose we get as an answer? Well, "We spent so much money in the first quarter, and then we spent so much money in the second quarter, and we found out in the third quarter we did not have sufficient funds." "Why did you not allot it so as not to spend more money in the first and second quarters, so as to create a deficiency in the third?" "Well, we needed the money." There it is. Upon his judgment, they needed the money, not upon our judgment or the action of the House; and they have run these Departments in that way until I do not know when you will get them out of the rut. I do not think the penalty of the act amounts to anything. It is a fine of $100 and imprisonment for a month. Well, no head of a Department would want to go to prison, and he would come in and deny the authority of Congress to put him in, and Congress can not put anybody in prison and can not fine anybody. That is a matter that would have to go to the courts. I do not think that it is a thing that you will accomplish.

The Department of Agriculture asked for a deficiency of $135,000. They wanted in addition $20,000 for a specific purpose—microscopic inspection of pork. We ascertained he had had a microscopic inspection regularly, but it turned out that the pork packers wanted to rush a whole lot of pork into Germany before the tariff took effect on the 1st day of March, and therefore he asked for $20,000 to permit that shipment. Well, we gave it to him, but did not give the $135,000 for other purposes.

Now, let us see the effect of that. He ought not to have had the deficiency of $135,000, but he has it. And suppose, as he intimated, that the investigation of scab in sheep and mange in cattle and many other things should be stopped because of lack of appropriation, and, as he suggested, the stopping of the business will cause the disease to recover the territory that had been cleared of it. Why, you will lose three times the $135,000. Therefore, when you talk about these deficiencies, and as a remedy the refusing to appropriate for them, you must remember the Government is involved. You are involved. The whole country is involved. If money is misappropriated or wrongfully disbursed and a deficiency occurs, the question is, Shall the Government suffer by it? I do not think the Government should suffer. I think we ought to find a remedy other than refusing to appropriate.

There is, Mr. Chairman, growing up in the Departments of the Government a habit of paying money out of one fund for another purpose. We are trying to stop it, and it is impossible to make appropriations as they ought to be made and keep them within the limits which the Appropriations Committee and this House place upon them unless you can prevent the disbursing officers, under orders from the heads of Departments, from doing that thing. For instance, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] gave you an instance of that kind that stirred up the House—a case where the head of a Department took from the contingent fund. That action made a deficiency of $2,650, and your committee had to make it good. What could we do except to put it back? Rather than see the Department of Justice go lame, we had to put it back. If we had failed to appropriate, that would have been no remedy. That would not have corrected the abuse at all. You must adopt some other measure to do that. There is another trouble——

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman submit to a question just there?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Suppose the Congress refuses to appropriate for it. Will it not have to be made good by the officer?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think not. They are not bonded.

Mr. PADGETT. But on his settlement does he not have to make a settlement with an auditor?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. Are not his accounts audited?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A departmental head has no accounts to audit. He does nothing but draw an $8,000 salary and disburse that. Public funds are paid out by his order.

Mr. PADGETT. Who paid out this money?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It was paid by the United States Government.

Mr. PADGETT. Upon what warrant?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Through the disbursing officer, upon the order of the head of the Department.

Mr. PADGETT. Does he have authority to order money paid out of the Treasury without authority of law?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is just what we have been talking about. It is an abuse which has grown up in the Government, and it ramifies every single part and parcel of its administration, and I suggest, gentlemen, that it is not so easy to get at it. It is like a disease that has fastened its fangs upon the human system. You have the disease; how are you going to get rid of it? I want to suggest that not by one jump or leap can you get rid of it. It will take time to do it, and perhaps you will have to adopt some other measure than the one we have suggested; but this is the best suggestion we could get hold of for the present. As time goes on, and as the evil becomes more plainly discerned and analyzed, we may be able to get some very simple remedy that will correct it. It was suggested by my colleague on my right here a moment ago that you dismiss the officer. How are you going about it to dismiss a Cabinet officer? The Constitution provides that those officers can be impeached. We could impeach him——

Mr. PALMER. No; you could not. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, I have accomplished my purpose, gentlemen. It is no frolic to get rid of this trouble, and if you think so you try it. In my humble opinion, our contingent funds in all the Departments are abused. Not that I mean to say that they commit graft or theft, but when a contingent fund is put at the mercy of a disbursing officer it is like giving a child more money than he wants for a trip uptown and back. He will surely spend the balance of it before he gets home. Your committee are trying to hedge that trouble. Whether we will accomplish it or not, I do not know. Now, about pensions, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN. Before the gentleman proceeds to that, may I ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. If you will look at page 50, line 15 and following lines, you will find the language:

> Any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office, and may also be punished.

And so forth. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, in order to remove an officer under that provision it would be necessary that there should be a judgment of ouster by a court?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I must confess that I am not lawyer enough to answer that question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would it not be better to put in that provision an amendment that would require the President or the head of a Department, whoever was the appointing officer, summarily to dismiss that offending officer?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think that would be a good amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose they should then refuse or fail to remove him?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, then you would be without remedy; but if we put in here a mandatory provision of the statute, probably the President or other officer would do it.

Mr. PALMER. Is it not a rather lamentable expression of weakness that the Congress of the United States, the law-making power, is not able to make a law to remedy this evil?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is a condition of affairs into which we have naturally drifted, and you can not weed it out in a day, or a month, or a year. That is all there is to it. Congress should have the nerve to do it effectually and early.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. MACON. If we were to defeat this bill, would not that weed it out?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir.

Mr. MACON. Do you think it would come again?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If you defeat this bill, you will weed out the administration of your Government.

Mr. MACON. In what way?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Everything will stand still and stagnate.

Mr. MACON. We shall make appropriations for the running of the Government in the general appropriation bills, which will come up hereafter.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That will not cover this. This is a deficiency that comes between now and the end of the fiscal year. This is to supply deficiencies from now until June 30. The regular appropriation bills will take up the expenses of the Government after June 30 for the succeeding twelve months.

Mr. MACON. Then you think it will clog the wheels of the Government to that extent?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The title of the bill indicates the absolute necessity for its passage. It is a deficiency. At home you have your larder and your smokehouse, and when you get up some morning and your wife says there is no meal and no meat in the larder, it is a deficiency that you have to meet. Do you think you can put it off until the end of the year?

Mr. MACON. If I have eaten too much the night before, I always do without my breakfast.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We have to supply the deficiency; that is all there is about it. I want to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and to my colleagues on the committee that this bill should be amended on the floor of this House, so as to reach the subs who make up the estimates. I think you catch my idea. The chief of a division makes up the estimate for his division, and that estimate is passed up to the head of the Department, to the Secretary of War, for instance, and he either O. K.'s it or cuts it. It comes down to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he either O. K.'s it or cuts it; but the men who are at fault in the first instance are the men who make the original estimates, and if you are going to put the brakes on the head of the Department, you ought to put some punishment on the head of the chief of division who makes these estimates, knowingly and willfully, against the law.

I was about to refer to the pension appropriation in this bill, $3,500,000. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that there should be a deficiency in the pensions. With a roll complete at the beginning of the year, with the amount that each pensioner draws fixed by law, it seems to me that an estimate ought to be made to a dollar. But the Commissioner says there are a great many pensions that come in after they put in their estimates. And while he did not say so, he smiled, and I suppose he referred to the conduct on this floor in granting pensions by the wholesale and with but little scrutiny or investigation. This is true, however, to some extent with this bill. Order No. 78 is responsible for a part of it. When you analyze that order No. 78, it is a lovely thing. They can turn it over one way and look at it and it is one thing. Turn it over the other way and look at it and it is a very different thing. What is it in substance, Mr. Chairman? It is this, and the action of this House last year tied up your Pension Commissioner hand and foot, and to-day he can not execute the law as you intended it. It is this, that when a man gets to be 62 years of age, if he is shrewd and smart and has an attorney who has discretion, he puts in his application on the ground that "I am 62 years of age." If he says, "I have rheumatism," that ruins his claim. Because, under the law, if he mentioned any other disability except his age he has to go before an examining board, and under the old law, if that examining board reports that he has not rheumatism, his age does not avail him, and he goes out.

If he goes in through the open door of 62, if there is nothing else to the contrary he goes in and he marches up until he is 65, and then under the present law he is entitled to $8, provided there is nothing shown to the contrary. Then at 65 he has evidence enough, as I say, to give him $8. He gets to be 68, and if there is nothing to the contrary he gets $10, your purpose evidently being to make a service pension of this kind. When a man gets to be 62 years old, whether he is as strong as Samson or as weak as water, he is to be pensioned, absolutely independently of every physical or mental disqualification. When he is 65, he shall be pensioned at $8, and when he is 68 he shall be pensioned because he is 68 and for no other reason. And when he is 70, he shall be pensioned at $12; that evidently was the purpose. But when that bill comes before you, if you intend to carry out that idea you should amend your law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after the transportation of coal, to which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE] alluded, it has got to be a very expensive thing for the United States Government. Our colonies—excuse me, our possessions abroad [laughter]—must be coaled and our vessels must be coaled in the waters of the Orient. Our colliers are too small and carry too small an amount of coal. They are fitted purposely to follow our Navy and supply our vessels everywhere and anywhere it is necessary. I want to suggest to this House and to the Naval Committee that if they will provide in the next bill for the building of some colliers suitable to transport coal instead of ships to fight with they will have done a sensible thing. If you are going to transport your coal exclusively in American bottoms, you will pay seven dollars and a half a ton unless you get more of them. You have destroyed all the competition that we had when we were shipping coal at four dollars and a half a ton, and now we are paying in this bill seven dollars and a half for coal to the Philippines. The question came up whether we could get coal in the Philippines, and there was an estimate made of $50,000 to buy a strip of 300 acres of land full of coal at the water's edge and the War Department almost convinced us that we ought to buy it and have it exploited, but we did not do it.

But, gentlemen, this is a question that is coming up to you one of these days, and what are you going to do about coal? Are you going to pay seven dollars and a half for transportation—pay two dollars and a quarter for the coal here and then pay seven dollars and a half to ship it? Are you going to depend on the few small vessels to furnish you coal in Hawaii and then fill up the bins of coal abroad? You have got to stop appropriating money to build battle ships and provide ships to haul coal to your possessions.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that the colliers are being built in the navy-yards?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not know about that.

Mr. KAHN. I know of one being built at Mare Island yard.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Those colliers are not to transport coal, they are fleet colliers. We want some large vessels to transport coal to Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines.

Mr. Chairman, there was a tacit agreement between us that we would not discuss the Panama appropriation or the isthmian canal appropriation at this time, but would ask that when we come to that item in the bill we should have two hours, or longer, set apart to discuss that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, will the gentleman from Georgia answer my question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I notice on page 33 of the bill a provision for the payment of the actual expenses of the district judges when required to hold court outside of their district.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Ten dollars a day.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman whether the committee of which he is a member investigated to ascertain whether they were still collecting the $10 a day or whether they were collecting only the actual sums actually expended by them?

Mr. LITTAUER. We had nothing in the hearings on that matter.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman will remember that the House at the last session in the general deficiency bill provided for a penalty for a judge certifying to more than he had actually expended for holding court outside of his district. That clause, I think, perhaps, was left out later in conference.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think that was stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The language that was placed in the sundry civil bill was different from what the law had been before. The word "actual" was inserted in it, so as to bear an interpretation that they were not to collect any more than their actual expenses, not exceeding $10 a day.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That language is here:

For pay of bailiffs and criers, not exceeding three bailiffs and one crier in each court, except in the southern district of New York: Provided, That all persons employed under section 715 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed to be in actual attendance when they attend upon the order of the courts: Provided further, That no such person shall be employed during vacation; of reasonable expenses actually incurred for travel and attendance of district judges directed to hold court outside of their districts, not to exceed $10 per day each, to be paid on written certificates of the judges, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States of reasonable expenses actually incurred for travel and attendance of justices or judges who shall attend the circuit court of appeals held at any other place than where they reside, not to exceed $10 per day, the same to be paid upon written certificates of said judge, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his account with the United States; of meals and lodgings for jurors in United States cases, and of bailiffs in attendance upon the same, when ordered by the court; and of compensation for jury commissioners, $5 per day, not exceeding three days for any one term of court, $85,000.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the gentleman know whether this sum is limited to their actual expenses or whether they have gone on just as they did before, charging $10 a day?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Between the time we had the matter before the House last session and this date, we do not know.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that the court of impeachment has decided by its judgment in the Swayne case that they are entitled to the $10 a day?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, I thought there was more politics in that decision than anything else.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I beg leave to suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], as well as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], that whatever the decision in the Swayne case may have meant, this provision of the law was made subsequent to that, and it was made in view of the holding in that case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I should like very much, Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen on the floor who are lawyers would look carefully into this paragraph, on page 33 and at the top of page 34, because our purpose was to stop dishonesty, and if this language will not cover it we will accept an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The language is all right; but I desire to learn as to whether the committee which has recommended the appropriation has limited the amount to the actual expenses or whether they have allowed $10 a day in this appropriation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; it is limited to the actual expenses, to be certified by the judge.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that. They are required to certify their actual expenses; but I think if the committee did not do so, without reflecting on the committee, that it would have been well for the committee to have investigated the question and ascertained whether they were still going on certifying $10 a day straight or whether they were certifying their actual expenses—$6, $7, $8, or whatever it may have been.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The individual members of the committee may have done so.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would be glad to know if any investigation of that kind is made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] if this language is not merely the reenactment of the law as it now stands?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Practically.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What was the purpose of putting it in the bill at this time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is the law. We usually reproduce the law—carry it from bill to bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is only in there as a matter of custom. It is really the law to-day?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would suggest to the gentleman that this is the law as it was placed in the sundry civil bill at the last session of Congress for the first time. It is not the language of the law prior to the enactment of the sundry civil bill at the last session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the provision that was put into the sundry civil bill was put in there as an enactment of law, and therefore it is a law on the statute books and it is not necessary to reenact it now.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, certainly; I agree with that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take advantage of the latitude allowed in general debate upon the urgent deficiency bill to set forth again the claims of the harbor of Beaufort, N. C., in my district, which is one of the best natural harbors upon the South Atlantic coast, for continued and further improvement by the National Government. The last river and harbor bill passed by Congress and signed by the President, of the 3d day of March, 1905, carried the following items for Beaufort Harbor and Inlet:

Improving harbor at Beaufort, N. C.: For maintenance, $2,000.

Improving Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 563, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, with a view to securing a channel 20 feet deep, $45,000.

APPROPRIATION OF $45,000 SECURED.

Under the appropriation of $45,000 to deepen and widen the bar or entrance to the harbor of Beaufort, work has already been begun by the Government, and the steam suction dredge Cape Fear is now at work in the harbor under this particular item. During the last Congress, as every member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives knows, while the bill was being framed in committee and upon the floor of the House, in season and out of season, I advocated this appropriation for the purpose mentioned in the act, and finally succeeded in having the same incorporated in the river and harbor bill. The river and harbor bill originated in the House and was passed by the House before any action was taken by the Senate whatsoever. The item of $45,000 for the improvement of Beaufort Harbor, which was put in the bill in the House through my direct efforts, was retained in the bill when it reached the Senate, and thereupon became a law. There has been some question raised as to whom credit was due for securing this appropriation, and the rumor has been persistently circulated that others than myself were entitled to the credit for securing this appropriation. I think the following letter, the original of which I have in my possession and a copy of which I herewith incorporate in my remarks, will set at rest any question whatever as to the fact that credit is due me as the Representative of the Third district of North Carolina, in which is included the harbor of Beaufort, for securing this appropriation.

The letter from Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1905.

MY DEAR MR. THOMAS: It has been brought to my attention that a statement has been made to the effect that the item of $45,000 for dredging the bar and providing a channel to Beaufort was decided upon by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors at the instance of others than yourself. I dislike to say anything upon the occasional rumors of this kind, but in justice to all concerned I feel bound to state the facts. You brought to my attention the report on the inland waterway in North Carolina, in which was contained an estimate for the Beaufort improvement. The fact that there was an estimate upon which we could base an appropriation had not before occurred to me or been suggested by anyone; also no one but yourself advocated this improvement, and whatever credit belongs to anyone for obtaining action by this committee clearly belongs to you. I am thoroughly familiar with the facts and can speak, not only for myself, but for the other members. I make this statement in justice to all parties concerned. Frequently rumors like that to which I have referred obtain circulation, and in such instances I have felt constrained to correct any erroneous statements which may have been made.

Very respectfully, yours, T. E. BURTON.

I would not allude to the matter again except that I am informed that the rumor has been persistently circulated that the appropriations were secured through the influence of Senator ALDRICH and others. Mr. BURTON, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, one of the fairest, best, and ablest men in the House, needs no corroboration, but the other members of that committee will corroborate his statements.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am more interested in securing the appropriation for Beaufort Harbor, and in the continuance of the work under the appropriation, and in securing additional appropriation for the harbor of Beaufort and its tributary waters than I am as to any matter personally concerning myself. Representing the county in which the harbor of Beaufort is located, the county of Carteret, at one time in the State legislature, having lived in that county for a number of years, familiar with the needs of the people of the county and the magnificent resources of the county and the great advantages of this great harbor, I have only an eye single to the welfare of the people and the improvement of this great outlet to the Atlantic Ocean. I wish you to see, and I urge upon Congress now, the importance of the continuance of the improvement which has been begun under my appropriation of $45,000 secured in the last Congress. When the last river and harbor bill was pending before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, I took occasion to investigate fully, while familiar with them in a general way, the exact facts in regard to the improvement of the harbor of Beaufort in former years and the history of the harbor. I obtained all the facts and data with reference thereto from the Chief of Engineers, having in charge river and harbor improvements at the War Department in Washington. Upon these facts, in part, together with the prospective improvement and advantages of the harbor, I based my appeals for the initial appropriation of $45,000 under which the improvement of this harbor has again been started.

In addition to the $45,000 appropriation, this harbor is entitled in the future to even larger appropriations in view of the fact that it has now become the terminus of a railway, the Atlantic and North Carolina Company, which, running in connection with the Southern Railway, makes a through line of railway from the Atlantic coast to the mountains of North Carolina, from eastern North Carolina to western North Carolina, thereby carrying out the old idea of Governor Morehead, of our State, that we should have an unbroken through line of railway from the coast to the mountains for the carrying of our freight and the linking together of every section of the grand old Commonwealth of North Carolina.

It is worthy of further and additional appropriation and improvement also because it will be the terminus of the great proposed inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C., the project of my colleague, Hon. JOHN H. SMALL, for which he has wrought so long and effectively, and in which project I have given him my hearty cooperation and assistance. In a former Congress I set forth fully the advantages of this great inland waterway and the necessity for its construction to avoid the dangers of Cape Hatteras and to protect the commerce of the country in time of peace and the Government in time of war.

IMPORTANCE OF BEAUFORT HARBOR.

The entrance from the sea is the first one of importance to be found going south from the Chesapeake capes. The importance was recognized at an early day, and the entrance was fortified by the General Government, Fort Macon being on the southern side. It has of late years become of more prominence, being on or near the lines of proposed water communication along the coast of North Carolina.

Beaufort Harbor * * * is not only the terminus of the Atlantic and North Carolina Railway, and the natural outlet of the inland commerce conveyed by the neighboring chains of water communication, but is also of great value as a harbor of refuge to vessels overtaken by storms on this, the most dangerous part of the coast of the United States. The bar forms a depth of 15 feet at mean low tide. This soon deepens sufficiently to give a channel of good width, and nowhere less than 25 feet in depth, to Morehead City, the railroad terminus. The tidal range is here between 3 and 4 feet. (Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1882, p. 1096.)

APPROPRIATIONS TO DATE.

The improvement of this harbor by the General Government was begun under an appropriation of $5,000, made by the act of July 4, 1836, with which funds spur jetties of large stone were built on the east and south of Fort Macon at that point. Work was resumed in 1881, when the erosion at the throat of the inlet was causing serious deterioration of the inside channel and threatening deterioration of the bar channel. The governing low-water depths were 15 feet on the bar and 2 feet to Beaufort.

The original project of 1881 was to stop the erosion at the inlet by jetties at Fort Macon and Shackelford Point, and to dredge to 9 feet depth at low water and 200 feet width the channel from the Bulkhead channel to Beaufort, and to 6 feet depth and 100 feet width the channel from North River to Beaufort; modified in 1887 by postponing the dredging from North River and by reducing the proposed dimensions of Bulkhead channel to 5 feet depth and 100 feet width; modified in 1890 by increasing the proposed depth of the Bulkhead channel to 7 feet. As amended, this project is completed. The sum of $148,843 has been spent on it.

The existing project of 1896 includes the maintenance of jetties and sand fences at Fort Macon and Shackelford Point and the maintenance of channel across Bulkhead shoal to Beaufort Harbor.

Amount expended on present project for maintenance, $8,734.95.

The erosion at the inlet has been stopped and the sand banks at Fort Macon and Shackelford Point have been built up and strengthened by means of sand fences. The 7-foot channel across Bulkhead shoal has deteriorated to a present low-water depth of about 3 feet. The governing low-water depths are 11½ feet on the bar and 3 feet to Beaufort. The tidal range varies from about 3½ feet at the inlet to about 2 feet at Beaufort.

STATISTICS OF BUSINESS, COMMERCE, INDUSTRIES, ETC., OF THE TOWN OF BEAUFORT, N. C.—LETTER OF CITIZENS OF BEAUFORT, N. C.

JUNE 29, 1903.

DEAR SIR: At a mass meeting of the citizens of the town of Beaufort held in the town hall on the 3d day of June the undersigned were appointed a committee to secure data and statistics of the business, commerce, industries, and different enterprises of the town of Beaufort and the county of Carteret, N. C., to be forwarded to you, in reference to the project of the inland waterway from Chesapeake Bay to Beaufort, N. C.

Beaufort is a thriving town on the eastern coast of North Carolina, the county seat of Carteret County. According to the last census, it has a population of 2,185; it is the third oldest town in North Carolina; was incorporated in the year 1722 as a port of entry by the English Government; it has a fine natural harbor, and notwithstanding the fact that it has never been deepened by the Government, yet vessels drawing 14 and 15 feet of water can come in with safety. Vessels have entered this harbor in the past drawing as much as 25 feet of water; in fact, Beaufort Harbor was the rendezvous of the United States fleet in 1864, in charge of General Butler, when the attack was made on Fort Fisher, and also the later one in charge of General Terry. This latter fleet contained near 300 vessels. By a reference to a recent report of the United States engineers in regard to the Beaufort Harbor it can be seen that with an outlay of from $60,000 to $100,000 the harbor can be deepened so that vessels drawing 25 feet of water can come into our port.

The town of Beaufort is only about a half hour's run from the sea, and the harbor is landlocked on all sides, and makes a good refuge for vessels from storms in any and all directions.

The county of Carteret is a very fertile county. The principal industries are fish, oysters, clams, and other sea products; farming, trucking, timber interests, etc.

The Gulf Stream is within 19 miles of our coast, and owing to its nearness truck and early vegetables can be raised at least two weeks earlier than they can be raised within 30 miles in the interior. Our soil is capable of raising cotton, corn, hay, rice, potatoes, vegetables, and numerous other products.

There was listed for taxation in June, 1902, in the county 157,903 acres of land; 1,956 town lots. The aggregate value of the real and personal property was, in round numbers, $1,000,000. The report from the custom-house for the port of Beaufort shows 225 registered vessels, with a gross tonnage of 2,675 tons. There are at least eight times as many smaller craft, which are engaged in commerce in the county, not registered in the custom-house, they being under custom-house tonnage. The amount of the gross sales of the merchants in Carteret County for the year ending December 30, 1903, aggregates in round numbers about $1,000,000; the amount of gross sales for the town of Beaufort aggregates $200,000; the number of vessels engaged in the oyster business in the county, dredgers, 54; smaller craft, 1,000. The number of licenses issued for oystermen for the year ending 1902 was 766.

The different commodities handled in the county for the year ending December 31, 1902, were as follows:

Cotton	bales	2,500
Cotton seed	bushels	7,500
Tobacco leaf	pounds	25,000
Rice, rough	bushels	2,000
Grain	do	100,000
Hay	tons	100
Potatoes	bushels	200,000
Vegetables	pounds	1,000,000
Cattle	head	2,000
Horses	do	3,000
Hogs	do	5,000
Poultry	do	50,000
Eggs	dozen	500,000
Fish	pounds	60,000,000
Oysters	bushels	1,000,000
Turpentine, crude	barrels	1,000
Clams	bushels	75,000
Wood	cords	200,000
Timber	feet	25,000,000
Lumber	do	20,000,000
Shingles	number	1,000,000
Fertilizers	tons	10,000
Machinery	pounds	100,000
Merchandise, general	tons	500,000
Passengers	number	20,000
Coal	tons	1,000
Peanuts	bushels	10,000
Fish oil	barrels	10,000

In gathering the above statistics the committee have in some instances been unable to get definite figures and have had to estimate the same. The estimates are very low.

With the inland waterway we feel confident that this business would increase treble.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Col. CHARLES J. ALLEN, Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army, President of the Board of Engineers having under consideration the project of an inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina.

SURVEY UPON WHICH LAST APPROPRIATION WAS BASED.

When the matter was agitated of making a fresh start upon the improvement of Beaufort Harbor I made also a thorough investigation of the various surveys which have been made for the improvement of the harbor. I could find none upon which to base an appropriation at first, but after many days of examination and effort I obtained from the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1904 an estimate for an appropriation of $45,000, contained in the survey of the inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet. The Chief of Engineers stated in that report of 1904 (pp. 1404 and 1415) as follows:

The bar at Beaufort Inlet, though subject to changes, as are all the bars on this coast, is one of the least unstable. It has a great advantage over Ocracoke and the other inlets on Pamlico Sound, in that there is no interior bar, and once the ocean bar is passed deep water is found. At present there is a channel 14 feet deep at low water. The distance between 20-foot contours inside and outside of the bar is about 4,200 feet, and between 30-foot contours about 5,800 feet.

Beaufort Inlet.—In the three preceding divisions of the waterway [Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet] the estimates have been based upon an excavation to 17 feet below the assumed mean low water. Here, however, on account of exposure to the ocean swells, it is thought well to increase the depth of excavation to 20 feet, and on this depth the estimates will be based. From the 20-foot curve inside to the 20-foot curve on the ocean side of the bar is about 4,200 feet, and the excavation required is about 300,000 cubic yards.

From experience on a similar bar at the mouth of the Cape Fear River it is assumed that the dredging can easily be done by a hydraulic dredge and at a cost not exceeding 15 cents per cubic yard. It is estimated, therefore, that the cost of the improvement of this bar will amount to $45,000. Its annual maintenance should not exceed one-third of this. The tidal oscillation is between 3 and 4 feet.

I thereupon called to the attention of Mr. BURTON, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the estimate in the survey of the inland waterway and succeeded in having the Committee on Rivers and Harbors incorporate the appropriation of $45,000 in the bill. This appropriation of $45,000, according to the report of the Chief Engineer, taking into consideration the range of the tide, which is between 3 and 4 feet, will give a depth upon Beaufort bar of 23 to 24 feet, conforming the depth of the bar to the depth in the channel from the bar past Fort Macon and up to the railroad piers at Morehead City, the terminus of the railroad.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown how the last appropriation for this harbor was secured, all former appropriations, the importance of the harbor, as shown by its commercial statistics, and its prospective development, in view of the recent progress and development of that section of our State and in view of the fact that it will eventually become, I hope, the terminus of the great inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort. I feel that I can not too strongly urge upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and upon the House of Representatives the continued improvement of this great haven for the shipping of the coast. The first harbor south of Cape Hatteras and the farthest harbor to the north from the Panama Canal, when that canal is constructed, as it will be, carrying through it the commerce and shipping of the world, there is no question in my mind that the harbor of Beaufort will become the most important upon the South Atlantic coast. Coaling stations will be placed there, because ships going across the ocean to Europe will not round Cape Hatteras, but coal at Beaufort Harbor and then cross the Atlantic Ocean to their destination. Continue this improvement, make additional appropriations, and build up here a safe and commodious haven for the shipping and commerce of our coast, and every dollar expended by the Government will be amply repaid in the benefits which will accrue.

THE RIVERS AND HARBORS CONGRESS.

Within the past few days there was held in the city of Washington a great convention, known as the "Rivers and Harbors Congress," consisting of delegates from all over the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. I was present, not only as a Representative in Congress, but as a delegate to this convention, appointed by the governor of my State, and took great interest in its proceedings. Resolutions adopted by this great rivers and harbors convention or congress recommended the appropriation of $50,000,000 instead of about $25,000,000 annually for rivers and harbors and set forth advantages which would accrue to the country from continued improvement of its waterways.

The whole drift of the times is in the direction of extending facilities for transportation by water and water-borne commerce. This is evinced by the construction of the great ship canal between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River, by the recent reconstruction of the great Erie Canal across the State of New York, and by the agitation in behalf of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, the inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort, and waterways all over the country. In my judgment, the Government can not better expend money than in giving the additional facilities by water required by the increased commerce, not only of the south, but the whole country, and there is no part of the Atlantic coast which is more entitled to consideration by the National Government than the great natural harbor of Beaufort.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield to a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have yielded the floor, Mr. Chairman, and I am perfectly willing to answer the question if the Chair will recognize me for that purpose.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman may have suggested a remedy for these evils he speaks of in exceeding the appropriations. If he did I did not hear it. Has the gentleman suggested in his remarks a remedy?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The committee has—very forcibly.

Mr. STERLING. I mean anything in addition to what the committee has suggested. I have read the report of the committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; I suggested in addition the dismissal of the officer guilty and the dismissal of the subofficer who made the estimate.

Mr. STERLING. I think the report includes that also.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir.

Mr. STERLING. The last page, I think, of the report provides for the dismissal of the officer.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; I see that. That refers to the head of the Department. It ought to include the subofficer who makes up the estimate.

Mr. STERLING. I came in when I thought the gentleman was speaking of some remedy he was suggesting which was not included in the report.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I was saying more emphatically that it was hard to find a remedy, and perhaps we had not found a remedy yet.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yielded the floor. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was promised the floor when I yielded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy any time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAPRON in the chair). For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to be recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is a member of the committee, and he has a right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the occupant of the chair who preceded the present occupant of the chair directed that after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] had concluded the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] was to be recognized. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has remaining eighteen minutes, if he desires to yield.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood, Mr. Chairman, that I was to be recognized after the gentleman from Ohio, who was to follow the gentleman from Georgia. That was my impression, but whatever the Chair does, however, will suit me.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is a member of the committee and has a right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to follow the arrangement made by the previous occupant of the chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, being a member of the committee, of course has the right to the floor in preference to a Member not a member of that committee. If he desires to go on I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] will yield, or has no desire to take up his time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to do anything that will accommodate everybody. I desire to discuss the bill, but if my colleague from New York [Mr. PERKINS] wishes to occupy some time of not a great length, I will yield in favor of him.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman in charge of the bill was to yield, I think, twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that it makes no difference to me when I occupy the floor. I wish, however, to state that I do not propose to say anything about the appropriation bill. I am to be recognized for thirty minutes—possibly I might ask for forty—to speak on something of importance, but not relating to appropriations. Now, of course, I yield to a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "A bill to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years." It is essentially a bill to supply urgent deficiencies. In the past it has not always been the practice to confine the items in this bill to what would be indicated in the title. The Committee on Appropriations this year has endeavored to confine the items in this bill to what are essentially urgent deficiencies for the present or for past fiscal years. There were submitted to Congress estimates of so-called "urgent deficiencies" aggregating $17,807,824.52. A number of the items submitted to Congress for inclusion in the bill were not in any sense items that could be properly designated as urgent deficiencies for the present or past fiscal years. There were, however, some items which unquestionably should be carried in this bill. There was an item of $3,500,000 for pensions for the present fiscal year, a sum that was not included in the estimates for the present fiscal year for one reason or another, and which, under the law, is required for the work of the Pension Bureau for this fiscal year. There was an item of $1,500,000 for the collection of revenue——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will correct the gentleman by saying it is not for work of the Bureau, but it is for paying pensions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, that is practically the chief work of the Bureau, to provide for the beneficiaries of the pension laws, and the money is required to pay persons who, under the law, now are, and will be until the 1st of July next, entitled to compensation under the pension laws. There is another item of $1,500,000 for the collection of revenues and $1,399,275.45 to pay judgments of the Court of Claims. These, in my opinion, are unquestionably items which are properly on an urgent deficiency bill. There is also an item of $5,340,786 for the Isthmian Canal Commission. Whatever the opinion of anybody else may be, I am quite clear that this item also is properly upon an urgent deficiency bill at this time. It is not forgotten that at the beginning of this session of Congress the Isthmian Canal Commission asked an appropriation of $16,500,000 to carry on the work of the canal up to the 30th of June, 1906. Because the Commission had not submitted proper estimates, also because of some criticisms which were made, not necessary now to detail, Congress appropriated only $11,000,000 of the amount asked, which it was estimated would carry the work of the Commission until about the 1st of April, 1906.

The Commission has since submitted a more or less detailed estimate of the moneys required for its work for the balance of the fiscal year. It is a deficiency, because this work is a public work in progress, a public work that is authorized, and the money heretofore granted is not sufficient for the present fiscal year. The money is required in order that the work shall not cease. The Commission has submitted to the committee information that it has been compelled to accept largely upon the judgment of the Commission as to the amount that will be required. The committee has separated the amounts and apportioned for specific purposes, having warned the Commission to be very careful to see that they obtained or submitted estimates for sufficient amounts for each particular purpose for which they were asking money. That makes of the total items in this bill which are unquestionably urgent deficiency appropriations $11,740,061.45. In addition there were estimates submitted for $6,067,763.07. The committee allowed $3,475,442.30, and disallowed items amounting to $2,592,320.70. Some of the items allowed, in my judgment, were proper and needed, and should be allowed. Some have been allowed which, perhaps, if it had rested with me, I would not have given at this time.

There are, however, estimated deficiencies, most of which, in my judgment, should not have been carried on this bill, and would not have been submitted if the law had been properly observed, aggregating almost three and one-half millions of dollars.

The deficiencies for which provision is made are due to several causes, deficiencies of an urgent character arising, for instance, as in the case of the Pension Bureau, where it was impossible to estimate the amount required, because impossible to say how many persons would be entitled to pensions. Such deficiencies as have been created by unusual occurrences in the transaction of the business of a bureau, by emergencies unforeseen that require urgent appropriations of a deficiency character, such as have arisen from the prevalence of severe storms during the past few months which have carried away a number of light-ships and which require additional and immediate appropriations to enable the Light-House Board to replace these ships in their proper stations.

Another class of deficiencies have arisen from the complete ignoring on the part of officials in the different Departments of the action of Congress. This has been the practice: The Departments have estimated that they would require a certain amount of money to conduct their Departments during the coming fiscal year. Those estimates have been submitted to Congress. Congress has scrutinized them and determined, in many instances, that only part of the amount determined upon by the particular Department should be allowed for the next fiscal year. Instead of revising their plans for the coming fiscal year, instead of readjusting the business which they intended to carry out, in many cases the officials have gone on exactly as if Congress had not cut their appropriations, and have expended money upon the theory that, although all they asked was not given to them at that time, there would be no doubt that they would get it as soon as they asked for it. That was very apparent to the committee in the consideration of this bill, and I will refer to two instances. One was that already referred to in connection with the Department of Agriculture; the other was that of the Treasury Department, which had asked for a certain sum of money for janitors and assistant custodians.

The Department was allowed a sum of $1,330,000, $45,000 less than was estimated. The chief clerk of the Department notified the Secretary of the Treasury that they required the amount estimated, but not allowed, in order to carry the number of men then on the pay rolls; that if the amount appropriated was apportioned and expended accordingly the amount available would be $45,000 less than planned to be expended by the Department during the present fiscal year; that it would be necessary to discharge some of the men then employed and to get along with less help. The Secretary and his chief clerk reasoned and acted in this way: "We will proceed," they said, practically, "with the number of men we now have and do the best we can, and take our chances upon getting from Congress this other $45,000 as a deficiency, although they have denied it to us now."

In my judgment, that action and actions of that character are utterly indefensible. They unquestionably are contrary to law. Some members of the committee may say, "Why are not these men punished by dismissal, by imprisonment, or by fine, under the provisions of the amendment of last year" so often mentioned in this debate. There was in that amendment a serious defect, which the committee has attempted to correct. In my judgment the proposed change will not cure the defect, and it requires a further provision. After a careful consideration of the amendment proposed by the committee, in my judgment it is necessary to frame some provision along these lines, that before the head of the Department, who is a Cabinet officer, shall waive any apportionment, there shall be submitted to him by the head of the bureau who recommends the waiver a recommendation in writing that the apportionment be waived or that the deficiency be created; and if then the apportionment is waived, or if then a deficiency is created, the head of the Department, and the man upon whose recommendation the waiver was made, shall be subject to the penalty provided if the waiver is unjustifiable or the deficiency unwarranted. It is utterly idle to imagine that any member of any Cabinet will be dismissed because he has erroneously or improperly or illegally waived such apportionments, even though it be in defiance of the law.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman one question right there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to know upon what the gentleman bases that kind of a statement, that a Cabinet officer could not be punished when he violated law and that a subordinate officer would be punished?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is based upon my experience in life. I do not know of any man who will ever be President of the United States who would dismiss from his Cabinet a member of it who, having certified in writing that an apportionment made as required by law should be waived, would tell the President that in his judgment it was necessary. And yet Congress might decide that the waiver was improper and believe it unlawful.

I need not go into recent history to justify the assertion that a President will stand up for members of his Cabinet, regardless of what other people think he should do. But if we place the responsibility where it should be placed, upon the heads of the bureaus, who go to the heads of the Departments and say that it is necessary to waive the apportionments and assures the Department head that otherwise the work can not be properly conducted, if he misleads the head of his Department, he will be quickly removed from office when the pressure comes to punish the offender, and in this way the offenders will be reached. As it is proposed to amend the law, it is apparent that no one will be reached. The provision is: "Anybody violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished."

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman easily point out what the changes made in the existing law are in this proposed amendment?

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman will find it pointed out in the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will take the report coming from the committee and will examine it, he will find out much more satisfactorily than can be stated the changes that are to be made.

Mr. MANN. I hoped to get it in the RECORD in some shape.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law at the present time provides this: That the appropriation shall be apportioned so that no undue expenditure shall be made at any part of the year, or so as to have equal expenditures for different periods, and that the apportionment shall be followed during the fiscal year, and shall not be waived except in writing by the heads of the Departments. I think that is a fair statement of the law at present. The committee suggests an amendment that provides that these appropriations shall be so made as to prevent an expenditure in one portion of the year—and this is the part of the amendment—" which may necessitate a deficiency or additional appropriation to complete the service for the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made," and this is the important part of the change to be made:

> And all such apportionments shall be adhered to and shall not be waived or modified except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment.

That change, it is believed, will prevent what happened at the beginning of the present fiscal year, when some of the Departments, in effect, made the apportionment in such a way that they would have a deficiency in the last quarter and rely upon getting the additional money, although disclaiming any intention of creating deficiencies.

There is another reason why these deficiencies are created, due to a long-continued and vicious practice. The chiefs who prepare and submit the estimates for the conduct of the different branches of the Government for the fiscal year submit their estimates in what might be said to be an automatic manner. They have been submitting the same estimates for the same work for a number of years, and they have been coming to Congress every year for exactly the same amount in the deficiency bill. For instance, for five years, if I recollect aright, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have asked for $45,000 for fuel for the schools of the District, and every year they have been here asking for a deficiency of $30,000.

Mr. MANN. On that point——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us how much of that coal was purchased from plain individuals, or how, or from whom.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I recollect the statements in the hearing, the Commissioners advertise for bids, and they have been purchasing here in the District from some local dealers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I know that is how it appears on its face, but has the gentleman looked up the different parties whom they bought it from, and is it true as a matter of fact that they bought it from the coal combination that is in the city, as it was when there were 6 feet of snow here?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not answer that question at this time, but I hope by the time the District of Columbia appropriation bill comes up I may find an opportunity to know more about it than I do now. I am on that subcommittee, and I shall have an opportunity to find that out, and I do not want to be diverted too far from the points of my statement to the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Go ahead.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At this time they asked $30,000 for the purchase of additional fuel for the schools, because if they do not have it the schools will have to be closed. The contracts are already made, and this additional $30,000 should properly have been asked for the present fiscal year and allowed in the regular District appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, is that an appropriation that is covered by the purview of this law? Are they required under the present statute to make an allotment of that appropriation so as to determine how much shall be paid for fuel each quarter, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they are.

Mr. MANN. So that if they have no money on hand when Congress is about to meet, or in session, or any other cause, and all their fuel is exhausted, they must close the schools or let the children freeze in the rooms?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. How else?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They ask for an additional sum and we generally give it.

Mr. MANN. But under the amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They would still get it. I am stating this one case of a deficiency being created in the Departments from the fact that they have never asked Congress and have never submitted an estimate to Congress for the amount of money that they know would be required during the fiscal year. They have come in year after year with an estimate for $45,000 for fuel. The committee has granted $45,000 for fuel. They come in then at the next session and say there is a deficiency in our fuel fund of $30,000, and they receive the $30,000. What they should have done the first time they found out that $75,000 would be required during the year for fuel was to submit an estimate for $75,000 and have it allowed.

Mr. MANN. That was part of their business. The gentleman has not heretofore been on the Committee on Appropriations or the subcommittee concerning the appropriations of the District; and now that he is on, and knowing the gentleman as I do, I think there will be a little better method pursued. It is also a part of the business of that committee to ascertain how much money is needed for fuel in the District, and, as a matter of fact, they call the Commissioners before the committee and asked them the question; and yet, knowing that they needed more money, they deliberately have brought in and we have passed an appropriation for a smaller amount, we knowing that the probabilities were they would come in and ask for a deficiency appropriation if we had cold weather. Now, does the law provide that the schools shall be closed? That is what I want to know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MANN. I think it does.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether it does or not, to be frank, and it is not material to this discussion.

Mr. MANN. It may be material to the question whether a point of order is raised on a proposition to amend this section.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from New York will permit me to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois on this particular item of $30,000 deficiency, one of the Commissioners came before the committee and admitted that the estimate for the purchase of coal during this fiscal year was made below what was known to be actually required, to keep down the amount of the District appropriation, and also because it had heretofore been the practice always to come to Congress to make up the deficiency, which they knew at the beginning of the fiscal year or at the time of making their estimates would be necessary for the next fiscal year. Now, this proposed amendment will simply require the Commissioners when making their estimates for the next fiscal year to make their estimate on the basis of what will be required, and not with the view of having their general appropriations as small as possible, with the expectation and intention of coming to Congress for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Of course everybody will agree that that is correct, but let us be frank about it. It has been the habit of the Committee on Appropriations to make their bills just as small as possible, sometimes for campaign purposes and sometimes for other and better purposes, and to rely upon deficiency bills; and I have not the slightest doubt that originally these Commissioners came in and asked, time and time again, for the full amount, and had it cut down, and had to come in for a deficiency appropriation. Now, I am not complaining about that, but what I want to know is whether if that happens we have got to close the schools on account of it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly not.

Mr. MANN. You will, if the construction——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the estimate is made in good faith, on the basis of past experience and on their judgment as to what will be required, and if the weather then is such as to consume more coal than could reasonably be anticipated, the consumption would be at the beginning of the fiscal year for which the estimate was made, it would be an extraordinary occasion, and it would be an unusual circumstance that would justify the Commissioners in coming to Congress for a deficiency.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, I wish to say this: He has complained that in times past Congress has not given the amount asked. These men have estimated year after year that $45,000 would be sufficient to supply fuel. Now, my experience in this House has been such that I have never been alarmed as to whether the Commissioners or the Department officials have been asking enough. I have always been trying to ascertain whether they have not been endeavoring to obtain more than they required, and I doubt whether any member of any committee in the House has ever had the idea suggested to him that perhaps somebody, through fear or under the influence of any other motive, has failed to ask what he needed. The trouble has been they have asked a good deal more than they actually needed.

Mr. MANN. Wait until our mutual friend from Missouri presents the case of the school-teachers to this House.

Mr. TAWNEY. I just want to quote from the testimony of the Commissioners on this point to verify what I said a moment ago with respect to their practice:

> Mr. WEST. If you will glance at the figures furnished in the bill, you will see that for the last five years Congress has appropriated the same amount for fuel for the public schools—$45,000. The custom has grown up of continuing the estimates at the same amount—$45,000—and coming to Congress for a deficiency.
> Mr. LITTAUER. Do you submit $45,000 always?
> Mr. WEST. I think that is the way it is done. I will ask Mr. Courts.
> Mr. COURTS. Yes; the estimate runs in that way.
> Mr. WEST. It has grown up as a custom, not that $45,000 will foot the bills, but that amount is put in at the outset, and then we come to Congress for a deficiency.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the Departments are not entirely responsible for this policy of coercive deficiencies. Congress itself is responsible to a certain extent, to the extent at least of the appropriation committees—not alone the general Appropriation Committee, but all those committees having jurisdiction of appropriations, because of their cutting down the estimates below what they believe to be honestly needed for the public service in order that they make a smaller appropriation under a general bill. But that is only a very small part of the evil or the cause of the evil.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from New York will yield——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly; the continuity of my speech is spoiled now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; nothing could spoil the speech of the gentleman from New York; his speeches always scintillate with brilliancy. The proposition the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations makes—and gentlemen will understand that I am not criticising the Committee on Appropriations either now or in the past—is that the Committee on Appropriations must appropriate enough in advance to meet practically all emergencies. Now, we are having a very mild winter, and I take it it will cost less for fuel this year in Washington than it does ordinarily. Are we every year to make an appropriation in advance supposed to be based on the coldest and longest winter in Washington, or shall we make an appropriation of a normal amount of fuel to be used and rely on the deficiency if one is needed? It seems to me it will be less extravagant, at times, to make a deficiency appropriation where needed, under certain circumstances, than to appropriate in advance all that may possibly be used.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, there is no trouble about the coal question; that is the simplest one of all the evils. The District Commissioners receive a certain appropriation for coal. They advertise for bids, agree to purchase the coal at so much a ton, and they can make their contracts for the entire appropriation and have it delivered any time they please. If the coal is used up in the schools, there will be no trouble about their obtaining more money for the purchase of more coal. I was only using this as an illustration of one of the causes of these deficiencies.

There is a fourth reason, and that is the one that has been referred to in this colloquy, and that is the action of the different committees of Congress in knowingly refusing to give different bureaus the money required for the public service. I do not wish to reflect on any particular committee, but I have in my mind an incident that came up when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration last year. It appeared that one bureau which, I think, for eight years had been given a contingent fund of $30,000 year after year by transfer in the Department, had got an additional $10,000. I offered an amendment on the floor to increase that contingent fund from thirty to forty thousand dollars so that the bureau could have the money absolutely required, and this committee, because the Naval Committee did not suggest the amendment, could not see any good in it and defeated it. Such action has encouraged the creation of deficiencies in the Departments. Whatever is required for the proper conduct of public business in an economical manner should be readily given. It does not make any difference whether it will make appropriations so large as to create a political issue or not. I believe that in this House we should face these things manfully. Whichever party may be in power ought to give the Government all the money necessary for the proper conduct of the public business, and I doubt very much whether such action could be made an issue that would result in defeating a political party in a campaign.

There is another cause for these deficiencies. Some of the heads of bureaus have submitted estimates for their work during the coming fiscal year without knowing or having the slightest conception of how much money would be required to conduct the business of their office. They have given a guess, they have hazarded an estimate, they have taken the chance that if the amount asked was not sufficient more would be given, and if it was more than necessary it would be turned into the Treasury if no way could be found to use it. Anyone who has read the hearings before some of the committees know that frequently bureau officials have been unable to give any reason whatever to justify the appropriations that they were asking.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do I understand from the gentleman that his committee, under these circumstances, go on and make appropriations in accordance with the estimates, or do they cut them down under the circumstances he has just disclosed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say this to the gentleman, that in the past I have not been a member of this committee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I so understood it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What we will do in the future I dislike to prophesy, but if I have any knowledge of any official coming in with an estimate that he can not justify, I will oppose the appropriation asked, and if I be overruled I shall give my reasons and make my objections here on the floor.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I think it is the duty of the gentleman to do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have stated what I believe to be the causes of deficiencies, and I shall state them again so as to summarize them: First, emergencies in the conduct of the public business that could not be foreseen and which necessitate urgent deficiency appropriations; second, deficiencies that arise by official ignoring of the plain wording of the statutes not to create deficiencies by officials spending money in defiance of the action of Congress in refusing to appropriate money for the purpose for which they estimated; third, the practice of making automatic estimates which those who submit them know will not be sufficient for the purpose of carrying on the business of their Departments; fourth, the action of Congress in refusing to give the amounts necessary for the proper conduct of the public business; fifth, estimates that are submitted by men with absolutely no knowledge whatever of what the bureaus require and who can not give justification for the amounts which they ask.

Mr. Chairman, that covers, so far as I am concerned, what I wish to say as to the causes of these deficiencies and what I believe to be the remedy that could be applied to obviate them. Change the proposed amendment of the law so as to require a certification by the heads of a bureau to a member of the Cabinet that a waiver was necessary, and if that resulted in a violation of law the subordinate submitting it should be punished by dismissal from the service. It may sound strange, yet it is true that it appears in the hearings before the committee in this session of Congress that some of the chief clerks and heads of bureaus remarked jocosely that if we did not allow the sums they asked for perhaps they would have to go to the penitentiary. It is necessary for Congress to impress upon the men in the administrative offices of the Government that Congress means just what it says in the law, and that if these men do not comply with it they will not only be dismissed from the public service, but they shall be punished as this law provides; and the sooner the men on duty in the Departments in Washington realize that the more quickly shall we be rid of these requests for deficiency appropriations.

There was a request for an appropriation in the nature of a deficiency which the committee did not allow. If I had had my way, I should have allowed it, at least some of it. I refer to the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department. The appropriation, I think, was $3,900,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think it was more than $4,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They asked a deficiency appropriation of $1,000,000. I may say before I start to cover that ground that a very peculiar thing developed in the consideration of this bill—that every Department official proceeded upon the theory that this law forbidding deficiencies was intended to apply to everybody else but himself, and they were at pains to explain that while this law might properly be applied to other Departments of the Government, it could not be applied to their particular Department of the Government. That was the prevalent belief that ran through the Departments. Without intending at all to reflect upon him, the attitude of the Secretary of State himself, a very eminent lawyer, in my opinion one of the ablest lawyers in this country, a man whom I highly esteem, is characteristic of the Department officials. In the communication asking for a deficiency appropriation for the contingent fund of his Department he stated that he hoped that this law would be changed so as not to affect his Department of the Government, "if it ever were intended that it should do so." The law is clear as day. Its meaning could not be misunderstood. These Department officials have not yet been impressed with the conviction that Congress was sincere when it enacted that law, and if there be anything that I can say upon this occasion which will bring home to them a very firm conviction that serious results will come from their violation of the law, I wish to say it now, so that this abuse, which has grown to such an alarming extent and for which it is difficult to place responsibility, may be obviated.

As I was saying, however, the Bureau of Steam Engineering requested $1,000,000 for the purpose of continuing the work of its department. This Bureau of the Navy Department is one with which perhaps I am somewhat familiar. It has charge of the repairs of the machinery of all vessels in the naval service. Vessels in commission undergoing the strain of active service will from time to time require repairs to their machinery. These repairs are expensive. Overhauling costs a great deal of money; and with the great fleet that we have in commission it is necessary to keep it in an efficient condition. It must always be ready for emergencies. As to whether money allowed this Bureau has been wisely distributed during the present fiscal year or not I shall not discuss, but I call the attention of the committee to the fact that Admiral Rae, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, stated to the subcommittee in charge of the bill that the amount of money that he had left on the 1st of January, 1906, $1,600,000, would not keep the ships going, that the monthly proportion which would be required for the machinery and the running of the ships would exceed the amount he had available.

I believe that some money should be allowed to that Bureau under the circumstances disclosed. There are throughout the country a number of navy-yards at present occupied with important work upon the vessels of the Navy, and if some appropriation be not made it will not only stop work in the Steam Engineering Department, but because that work is stopped it will practically stop work in every other bureau in the navy-yards and make impossible the continuance of work there upon vessels now out of commission.

Mr. Chairman, the cost of the transportation of coal has already been discussed quite fully. It is my intention to offer, when that point in the bill is reached, an amendment that the money herein appropriated for the transportation of coal for the Navy shall be expended regardless of any law requiring coal now to be transported in American bottoms. Before the passage of the law requiring coal to be carried in American bottoms it cost $4.87 a ton—that was the highest price paid—to transport coal from New York to Manila. Pocahontas coal, the best coal obtainable for the Navy, costs here $2.50 a ton.

Since the passage of that law it has cost on the average $7.50 a ton for such transportation. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, about $900,000 was expended to transport coal to the Philippine Islands. If the law requiring it to be transported in American bottoms had been in effect it would have required over $1,200,000. I am opposed to the continuance of such a law.

There was some discussion before the committee about some matters connected with the Panama Railroad to which I wish to refer. There has been considerable discussion regarding the congestion of freight on the Isthmus, and, as Members know, the difficulty has been attributed by the Secretary of War and by the Canal Commission to the action of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. The Secretary says that they refuse to handle the freight; that they leave the port with only half cargoes or third cargoes, and in other ways contribute to the congestion there, so that——

Mr. MANN. You mean the Pacific Mail Steamship Company?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; which I understand is controlled by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. So that as a result of the congestion that is claimed to exist there terminal charges for labor on the west coast of the Isthmus, a charge in the operating expenses of the Panama Railroad, have increased from three to eleven thousand dollars a month. I have here a dispatch to the Washington Star, dated at San Francisco, January 17, 1906, in which it is reported that Mr. R. P. Schwerin, vice-president and general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, said yesterday:

> The Pacific Mail is in no wise responsible for congestion on the Isthmus. On the contrary, our ships have been compelled to lie over at Panama for eighteen, nineteen, and twenty days, when they should remain at Panama not more than a week. And we have had to work early and late at this end of the line trying to keep them on their schedule. I do not know the cause of the congestion on the Isthmus, for I have not been there. I know, however, that the Pacific Mail is just as keenly interested in the Panama trade as it ever was. It is true that some of our steamers have come away from Panama without full cargoes, but the reason for it is they have not been given the freight.

Who is responsible for the condition there I am unable to say, but very evidently there is a gross congestion of freight on the Isthmus which should not exist. I have been inclined to believe that the Panama Railway Company (which is owned entirely by the Government of the United States) or the Isthmian Canal Commission, or whoever has jurisdiction of the matter, is not entirely free from fault, because I have here one of the Consular and Trade Reports, issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor, under date of January 4, 1906, treating of the causes that make it impossible to extend the export trade of this country, which contains a letter from a shipper who blames the Panama Railway Company for the obstruction of freight and the impossibility of successfully continuing in the export trade. This passage from this report says:

> Another instance: A customer on the west coast of Central America writes me that our goods give perfect satisfaction and himself and friends would like to make up some large orders for us, but unfortunately he finds it impossible to use any more of our goods because the Panama Railroad Company charged him $5 gold per package for transporting goods across the Isthmus (40 miles), and this prohibits him from using American goods. Had the Panama Company been even moderately extortionate in their charges we might have developed quite a trade in this country, but they have killed the bird which would have laid many a golden shekel for them.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state the author of that letter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is an extract, I believe, written by the manager of the Page Woven Wire Fence Company, addressed to the American Exporter, and published in a report issued by the Bureau of Manufactures of the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. What date?

Mr. FITZGERALD. January 4, 1906.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion? I have examined this matter to some extent and find that the reasons given for the blockade of freight there is that the railroads have not cars enough to control and carry the freight of the Government, which freight is given priority over commercial freight. Commercial freight must wait until the Government has been served; and that is the reason given for it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to state that while it may be true that the railway rates are too high, that the railway rates have been more than cut in two—that is, the local railroad rates—for transit across the Isthmus since the Government acquired control?

Mr. TAWNEY. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that immediately after the adjournment of the committee yesterday, when the gentleman made the same statement that he has just made here, I communicated with the Secretary of War for the purpose of ascertaining what the local rate on the railroad from Colon to Panama is at the present time; and in reply I received the following dispatch, which I would like to have go in the RECORD in connection with this statement, although it is not yet as definite as it will be by information which will be furnished later. The dispatch is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 18, 1906.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, House:

Your dispatch received. Can not believe the statement to be true. The freight rates from New York to Panama via Colon, over the Panama Railroad Steamship Line and the railroad, were on the 1st day of July last reduced 50 per cent. A greater reduction was allowed for Canal Commission merchandise, but in order to prevent discrimination the Commission merchandise now pays the same rate as the public. A very material reduction has been made in the local rates on the Panama Railroad, but the percentage I am not able to state. Have telephoned to the New York railroad office for a definite statement upon the subject, and upon receiving answer will immediately advise you.

WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am glad to have that go into the RECORD at this time for this reason: The Secretary of War and the officials of the Isthmian Canal Commission attribute the congestion on the Isthmus to one cause; the Pacific Mail Steamship Company attributes the congestion there to the employees of the railway company, which company is owned entirely by the Government, or to the employees of the Canal Commission. The Bureau of Manufactures, which was established for the purpose of issuing reliable information to those desiring to engage in the export trade of the country, issues a statement which is an official notice, that a Government railroad, a railroad owned by the Government of the United States, maintains such exorbitant freight charges that it is impossible for anybody successfully to export goods from this country by way of the Panama Railway to the west coast of South America.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not quite understand how this man can know what the railroad rates are from Colon to Panama. He would not ship goods from New York—the Page Woven Wire concern is located in Pittsburg—to Colon and then expect them to ship from Colon to Panama on a separate bill of lading. And I apprehend that the gentleman who wrote the letter knew absolutely nothing about the freight rates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may possibly be true.

Mr. MANN. It is evident on the face of it that it could not be true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may possibly be true, but the person to whom that criticism should be addressed is the head of this Bureau, who put his official sanction upon this letter by quoting it in an official report issued for the information of the manufacturers and exporters doing business in this country. I am not responsible for this Bureau.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands that the head of the Bureau is a very nice gentleman, who has been in the newspaper business so long that possibly he is not always able to distinguish between facts and sensationalism.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am inclined to believe that that is another reason why the people of this country should change the administration of the government.

Mr. MANN. Now, let me say in reference to the Panama Railroad Company, it is undoubtedly true that freight is congested there now. It is easy to understand how it could not be otherwise. We are shipping great quantities of freight to the Isthmus for use in connection with the construction of the canal. At the same time we are double tracking the road, which to a certain extent interferes with the present track that is there. So while we are putting upon them an extra amount of freight, we have less track room than we had before. And it is perfectly self-evident that there will be a congestion there, as there is in Pittsburg now, and as there is in many other places in the country now for a time. When we succeed in getting our double-track road, it will be all right, and we would have gotten it a little quicker, I may say, if we had made an appropriation of $15,000,000 before the holidays than we will now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, we appropriated all the money they can use up to the 1st of April in the $11,000,000, and they can not possibly use the $5,000,000 we are giving in this bill until after the 1st of April, and they will have it in ample time to use for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I believe that is practically true. That they will not use any more than they can is very evident.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They never intended to use it before the 1st of April.

Mr. MANN. They intended to if they could.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they say they will not use quite within $150,000 by the 1st of April of the amount that we have already allotted them in the $11,000.000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I heard the gentleman say a few moments ago that the cause of the congestion at the termini of the Panama Railway was not caused by the refusal of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to take the freight.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I did not say that, if the gentlemen will pardon me. I stated that the Secretary of War attributed the congestion to that cause, and then I read a dispatch of the general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in which he attributed the congestion to the officials under the Secretary of War. I am not vouching for the veracity of either statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman read the testimony of the Secretary of War, in which he said that he had letters from the president of the Isthmian Canal Commission, in which three specific instances were cited in which the steamship company refused to take freight?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I read that, and also read his statement that he would send the letters to the committee, but although I searched the hearings carefully I have not been able to find the letters to which he referred.

Mr. TAWNEY. The letters are in possession of the chairman of the committee. They came too late to be printed in the additional hearings; but I will present them to the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggested that the Secretary and the officials of the Commission had attributed the congestion to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and the general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company attributed the congestion to the officials of the Government. I am not characterizing either statement; but I think there is enough here to require the committee that has jurisdiction of this matter carefully to scrutinize the matter at some time. It is not the duty of the Committee on Appropriations. I also stated that I believe that perhaps the Panama Railway Company might itself be somewhat to blame, and I read an extract from the report issued on the 4th of January this year by the Bureau of Manufactures to substantiate the belief I had in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue his remarks for twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for twenty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to suggest this question, Mr. Chairman, that the testimony before the committee shows that after having loaded freight from the Panama Railway terminus in one of the Pacific Mail steamships the captain of the ship undertook to unload it again, and wanted to refuse to take that freight, on the theory that they had discontinued landing at certain ports to which they had previously been in the habit of going, and that the management of the railway company refused to allow him to unload the freight. Is not that the fact?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is exactly true; and I will say to the gentleman that my belief is this, that there have been faults on both sides, and that the greater publicity given to transactions between this company and Government officials will result in much improvement in the service, unless these gentlemen are a little too sensitive to criticism.

There is but one other matter to which I desire to refer, and that is the provision of the bill repealing the 8-hour law so far as work on the isthmian canal is concerned. I am opposed to the repeal of the law itself on principle, but I am more opposed to the repeal of the law so far as it applies to this particular work, because of the extraordinary reasons assigned in the request by the chairman of the Canal Commission and by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not subject to a point of order, and would it not go out on a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It changes existing law.

It appears from the hearings that there are two pay rolls on the Isthmus; one is the so-called "gold pay roll" and the other the "silver pay roll." They pay some men $1.04 an hour for eight hours' work, and some 80 cents an hour for eight hours' work.

Mr. MADDEN. That is a day. Eighty cents a day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One dollar and four cents a day, and eighty cents a day in gold. I inadvertently said hour for day. That on the silver basis makes the men on the gold pay roll get $2.08 a day, and the men on the silver pay roll get $1.60 a day in silver. That is, the silver of the country is worth 50 per cent of the gold.

Mr. LITTAUER. If the gentleman will allow me to correct his figures, the pay of the men on the so-called "silver roll," the common-laborer roll, varies from 20 cents an hour to 26 cents an hour, according to the proficiency of the laborer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In silver, 20 cents an hour. When they are first put to work, it appears they are paid 20 cents an hour in silver.

Mr. MANN. When we were down there a year ago, they were paying 15 cents an hour.

Mr. LITTAUER. The pay is so far in excess of what these same men get in any country that they come from, these Jamaicans, that they are all trying——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That they are all trying to get back to the countries from which they come.

Mr. LITTAUER. And then as soon as their holidays are over they try to get back to the canal. The testimony shows that 2,000 Jamaicans went home to celebrate the Christmas holidays; that they had accumulated money and went home to spend it; and now 500 of them have gone back and the rest of them are trying to get back.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I wish to state my objection to the change in the eight-hour law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say some of the laborers are paid in silver and some in gold. Why is that so?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to state exactly, though I believe it is a condition that is necessary because of the currency in existence there, and these men are paid in silver, I believe, because it is the money to which they are accustomed in the place where they live.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They prefer it because they are familiar with it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are they given in silver the equivalent of gold?

Mr. MANN. They use silver on the Isthmus. Whatever money they are paid in, silver is the money in circulation on the Isthmus. People who go from this country there insist on being employed on the gold basis, which is the basis in use in this country. When they are paid and wish to spend their money, they transfer it into silver.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What I am trying to get at is, there are some laborers to whom you pay your 50-cent dollars and some who are paid 100-cent dollars.

Mr. MANN. The ordinary laborers are all paid in silver.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The other laborers are paid in our dollars?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you make this distinction?

Mr. MANN. On the Isthmus all the money in circulation is silver.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you pay one man on one basis, why should you not pay another man on the same basis?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can state this satisfactorily and then preceed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These people are accustomed to the Mexican currency, as I understand it. They understand what a dollar in Mexican money means. That dollar in Mexican money, in silver, is only 50 cents according to our standard. If our officials offered them 50 cents on a gold basis, they would think they were getting half the amount they were entitled to. If they are offered a dollar in silver, or 20 cents in silver, which they understand, there is no dispute about it. That 20 cents in silver is equivalent to 10 cents in this country with the gold basis. Now I hope that is clear and that I may proceed with my speech.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me ask you a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Go ahead.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you are paying them in 50-cent dollars, in silver dollars that are only worth 50 cents, why do you not give them $2 in silver, so as to equalize them with the laborers who are paid our gold dollars? That is the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, the men who are on the gold roll, as they call it, are not given any undue advantage over these men. Their rate of wages is fixed upon the standard that they understand, and where a man on the gold roll is paid a dollar, he gets a dollar as we understand it. When a man on the silver roll gets a dollar, he gets really 50 cents as we understand it, but a dollar as it is understood where he comes from or where this Mexican silver is in use.

Mr. PRINCE. Each gets like pay for like work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly, except that I guess our mechanics who go down there expect to get a little more pay; but each man is paid what he agrees to work for. That is the thing to be borne in mind.

Mr. PRINCE. Like pay for like work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These laborers are paid 20 cents an hour on a silver basis, or $1.60 a day on a silver basis, which in this country would mean 80 cents a day. After they are there for some time and show their proficiency they are advanced to 26 cents an hour, silver, or $2.08 a day in silver, or $1.04 a day on the gold basis, as we understand it. Now, they are charged by the Government officials who have charge of that matter there 27½ cents in gold for their lodging and keep. That makes 55 cents a day out of the $1.60 a day, silver, that they get for their work.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Government keep the boarding house?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, these houses are built and maintained by the Government, and whatever the arrangement is, the cost to these men under the supervision of the Government is 55 cents silver per day out of their $1.60 in silver per day that they get.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that money taken by the Government? Does the Government run the whole business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; everything is done by the Government in connection with this work, unless I am very much mistaken.

The suggestion is made that the eight-hour law be repealed so far as this canal work is concerned. They say if the law is repealed they will work these men ten hours a day and reduce the compensation per hour and in that way increase the amount of work they can get for the money they pay.

I am not very familiar with the condition of these Jamaica blacks that are used down there, but it seems to me an inhuman proposition that these men should be compelled to work longer and be paid less than they are now getting for a shorter day; in other words, that they be compelled to work ten hours a day for less than 80 cents, as we understand it, when it takes them about 27½ cents, as we understand it, to keep themselves, and that makes no allowance whatever for the keep of their families, a number of whom, I understand, are there. They say—the Government officials—that sixteen hours a day are too many hours for a man to sleep, and there is nothing else for him to do down there practically except to sleep and work, and it appears in the hearings that these officials say that the way to keep these negroes out of devilment is to work them longer and they will be more healthy. They say that on the plantations in Jamaica these men work from daylight until sunset, but the work is of an entirely different character. In the Canal Zone no one can work as well or as long as in cooler climes.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman, does he not think that the Government is under an obligation to build this canal as cheaply as it can?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that it ought to get its labor as cheaply as it can?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am opposed to this theory of obtaining labor as cheaply as you can. I believe every man is entitled to a living wage, wherever he is situated, and I am opposed to this Government attempting to take advantage of these miserable people who live in a tropical country and to work them like slaves in the building of this canal. For my part, I would sooner have the canal cost $100,000,000 more, so long as these men are treated as men and not as mere brutes.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I am glad to get this answer from the gentleman. It is such a splendid Republican statement for the protection of labor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care whether it is Democratic or Republican, or anything else; I believe it is humanitarian, and we ought to be for what is decent and manly. I recollect sixteen years ago when the city of New York was building its great aqueduct, and I remember the North Carolina negroes and the Virginia negroes who had been brought up there and put to work in making the excavations through the solid rock, and I remember the miserable hovels in which they were compelled to live, just shacks with bunks four or five high, and that under the surveillance of the people of a great city, an intelligent, patriotic, and humane people; and when I recall the conditions that existed then and imagine what may exist on this Isthmus if a free rein be given, I want to say that if I can prevent it the law as it applies to the Isthmus for the building of this canal will not now be changed.

I have tried just to summarize some facts, Mr. Chairman. I do not care to detain the committee at this time with other reasons that impel me to entertain the views I do on this matter. If the eight-hour law be repealed, there is nothing to prevent these men being worked more than the proposed ten hours. According to the theory of the officials all that would be necessary would be to determine how long the men should sleep and work them the rest of the time; because they say there is no possible manner in which a man can amuse himself down there, and they practically divide the time into three parts—working time, eating time, sleeping time. So far as I am concerned, regardless of where these people come from, regardless of whether they be American citizens or aliens, whether they come from the Orient or from the Tropics, I believe that all of the safeguards, all of the protecting force of this great Government should be extended around them and that we should treat them in a manner that will commend itself to civilized men throughout the world, and reflect undying credit and glory upon ourselves. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to my colleague the gentleman from New York, Mr. PERKINS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is curious to consider the changes which sometimes come in the meaning of words, the changes, and often the sad changes, that come in accepted beliefs. We see that a people professing a pure faith at the shrine of reason, but in course of time prostrated in superstition before a meaningless fetich. The pure faith imparted by the apostles in the hands of the doctors and the schoolmen becomes an unmeaning formula. Mr. Chairman, the doctrine of protection was taught in this country early and it was taught by great men. Hamilton and Clay believed that to have a great nation it was necessary to have great manufacturing industries. They said that a nation that was agricultural and nothing else could not become one of the great commercial nations of the world, and that legislation should be had to build up, if necessary, to assist the manufacturing industries of the land. Time went on and another argument was furnished, because in this country the wages paid to laboring men were higher than in any other country, and it was said that there should be such protection as would measure the difference between the higher wages which the American manufacturer did pay—between the higher wages which the American manufacturer ought to pay—for the benefit of the land and of its workingmen.

Now, I think I have stated what we may call the pure doctrine of protection, the faith that was given us by the fathers. Such laws were passed; great industries were built up in this land. It has been claimed time and again that to some extent, at least, to a large extent, probably, the great development of industry was due to the effect of protective tariff legislation, and it has also been said, by friends and foes, that to develop, to increase manufacturing industries was the reason and the justification of protective laws. We now witness some things that make us wonder whether perhaps a rational belief has turned into a superstition; whether the doctrine of protection, instead of being regarded with wise reverence has not become a fetish to which we bow in unintelligent fear.

When a great manufacturing industry, when great manufacturing industries, come before the Congress of the United States and say there is a provision in the tariff law which instead of doing them good does them harm, and when they are told that the tariff is so sacred a thing that not one jot or tittle can be changed, even if it cripples an industry, then we ask: Is that following out the theory of the protective law that was intended to build up industries? Mr. Chairman, when Balak bade Balaam to curse the people that came from Egypt and covered the face of the earth Balak said to him: "Behold, I took you to curse my enemies, and behold thou hast blest them altogether." Shall the reverse of that be said, Mr. Chairman? Shall the great manufacturers say to us: "You were bidden to bless us, and behold you are cursing us altogether?"

No one can question that the shoe manufactories of the United States are a great industry. Their product annually is from two hundred millions to three hundred millions of dollars, and that is a great industry even in this great land. They employ nearly 100,000 people, and they furnish sustenance in that way to nearly 500,000, and that is a great number even in this populous land. This request for modification in the tariff has been spoken of as if it were a Massachusetts request, and gentlemen say in the House, "Massachusetts? Why does Massachusetts ask this and ask that?" The request comes, Mr. Chairman, from the manufacturers of boots and shoes from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There were here two or three months ago representatives of this industry that came from Massachusetts, that came from New York, that came from Rochester, the city I represent, that came from Chicago, in the State of Illinois; that came from Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin; that came from Minneapolis and St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota; that came from St. Louis, in the State of Missouri. Two of the greatest of the manufacturers were from the State of Missouri, from the city of St. Louis.

It is perfectly apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the question of the tax upon hides is not a local question. Such an industry is entitled to consideration, and if the provisions of the tariff are not intended to protect manufacturing industries, upon what basis do such laws stand? The first question which I shall discuss is, Does this tax upon hides harm anybody? because if it does not, why, that is the end of it. It is not very hard to show that. There has been much talk about what difference the tax upon hides made in the cost of a pair of shoes. Some have given higher figures and some have given lower figures. In the first place, we may say, Mr. Chairman—and this is unfortunate—that the extra cost resulting from the tax upon hides falls chiefly upon the cheaper classes of shoes. For some reason, the wisdom of which certainly is difficult to divine, there is no tax on calfskin, there is no tax on sheepskin; the only tax that is imposed is the tax on cattle hides, principally, of course, a tax upon the hides of steers.

That leather is chiefly used in the manufacture of the cheaper classes of shoes. So if there is any harm, it comes in the very worst place that it could come, not on the higher-priced shoes, but on the lower-priced shoes. There have been many estimates of the difference resulting from the tax on hides. Persons have testified—I have heard great shoe manufacturers say that has amounted to a difference of 5 cents a pair. I think, Mr. Chairman, that statement is overstated, and for my argument I would much rather put it lower than higher. It makes a difference of a cent and a half, we will say, on each pound of hides. It is an underestimate to say that it makes a difference on the average in a pair of shoes of 2 cents. I will concede for this argument that the only extra expense in the cost of the manufacture of a pair of shoes by reason of the tax on hides is 2 cents and no more. Some gentlemen say, what is 2 cents a pair?

I will show to you, Mr. Chairman, what 2 cents a pair means. The average price of a pair of shoes for the manufacturer taking all sorts is, we may say, roughly, $2; it is not over that. Two cents on $2 is 1 per cent. The average profit of the shoe manufacturers of the United States does not exceed 5 per cent of the business. The shoe manufacturers, it must be remembered, do not keep up the price by any great combination. There is one great industry that comes before the American Congress which is not a combination or a trust to keep up prices and gain great profits from an artificial combination. The price of boots and shoes is fixed by a vast number of competitors in an absolutely free market. There are no proceedings by the Attorney-General against the boot and shoe trust. They sell their boots and shoes in open competition, every man with another, and so instead of the great margin of profit that is obtained by some industries, which certainly are more favored by the American Congress than the boot and shoe industry, they sell on an average profit of 5 per cent. The extra cost of hides is 1 per cent. The result of the protective legislation of Congress is to absorb 20 per cent of the entire profit of the boot and shoe industry.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, certainly; I will yield to anyone.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. You are commingling the 2 per cent and the 5 per cent.

Mr. PERKINS. I beg your pardon, I said 2 cents a pair was 1 per cent of the cost.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. One per cent of the cost——

Mr. PERKINS. The average profit is 5 per cent of the cost.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. But you do not mean to say by that they only make 5 cents an average on a pair of shoes?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, not at all. If a pair of shoes cost $2, it is safe to say the average profit to the manufacturer would be 10 cents. The extra cost resulting from the hide is 2 cents, which takes 20 per cent of the amount that he would make.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is assuming he gets all the profit in case the tariff is taken off hides?

Mr. PERKINS. Precisely; that is another question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And you are proposing to work the proposition out?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Your proposition, then, is to remove the tariff on hides, not for the purpose of reducing the cost of shoes to the consumer, but for the purpose of enhancing the profit to the manufacturer.

Mr. PERKINS. I was taught that the principle of the protective tariff was to build up and assist American industries, and, as I understand, to assist an industry is to enable it to make money.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. In that connection, of course.

Mr. PERKINS. What they will do with it we will see about afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. In fixing the tariff all industries are considered, not simply the manufacturer. The farming industry is equally of importance in the eye of the tariff maker as the business of the manufacturer.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly. Now, let us illustrate what this tax amounts to.

Mr. TIRRELL. The cheap shoe that the gentleman has referred to is the one where there is the greater burden by reason of the imposition of this tax?

Mr. PERKINS. That is what I understand.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, a cheap brogan shoe is made in my town, and the cost of making it is from 70 to 90 cents. So if the gentleman will figure on that basis, his argument will be much stronger than the one he is advancing.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand, of course, that some of these cheap shoes cost less than $2, and in these, it must be said, the extra cost of the duty on hides, as my friend from Massachusetts has justly said, is much more than 1 per cent, but I gave the average on all sorts of shoes, because there are other shoes—shoes costing two and one-half to three dollars, where the extra cost resulting from the higher price of the hide would be a much less percentage.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The 70 or 90 cents was labor cost?

Mr. PERKINS. The whole cost.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Material and labor and everything?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me put this before the committee in another way, because I have heard so many say, "Oh, you gentlemen who are talking about hides; it is a little thing; why do you want to bother us all the time talking about hides? Talk about something that is of importance." Now, let us see what this 2 cents a pair, which is not an overestimate, amounts to. In the United States in the production of last year it amounted to $4,000,000. The shoe manufacturers in the United States paid last year on account of this duty $4,000,000, figuring it at 2 cents on each pair of boots and shoes they manufactured. Is that nothing? Can we turn to a great industry and say, "We can not pay attention to your demands; we think they are of small importance," when they cost that industry annually $4,000,000?

Why, Mr. Chairman, we all remember in the last Congress we wanted a public-building bill. It was said it would cost about five or six millions of dollars, and we were told by the leaders of this House that this great country, the United States of America, could not stand an extra expense of five or six millions of dollars. And yet they turn around and say to one industry of the land, "If it only cost you $4,000,000, we can not interfere with our legislation in order to attend to a matter like that."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say no more about what the burden of the tax is. Let us see who gets the benefit of the tax. My friend from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] suggested a minute ago that we must consider these things in all their lights. Surely we must. The boot and shoe men are not the only men in the country. Who gets the profit of the imposition of a tax that costs that industry $4,000,000?

Mr. Chairman, that seems to me so simple that I can hardly believe a man can doubt where it goes. There was our friend from New Jersey the other day, a well-known farmer and agriculturalist, who informed us that he had slaughtered four steers, that he sent the beef down to the local markets, that he sent the hides to the local markets, and he figured he had gotten from 50 cents to a dollar, perhaps a little more, extra for the hide. I presume he did, and certainly we are all glad to benefit the Member from New Jersey. But, Mr. Chairman, even to benefit him to the extent of $5, I do not think it is fair to take $4,000,000 out of an industry. There are in this country few cattle, a very few, which are slaughtered by the farmer. The beef is sold separately and the hide. It seems to me entirely probable that the man who takes the hide and sells it by itself, having first sold his beef somewhere, should get—and I presume he does get—the benefit of this tax. If so, he gets 50 cents, a dollar, or a dollar and a half more per hide.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, at this point, if it is not true that the farmers get an enhanced price for their cattle by reason of the enhanced price for their hides? And is not that included in the money paid for the cattle by the dealers?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, that is not true.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield, but I think it only fair that my time be extended.

Mr. NORRIS. We will extend your time. If it is true that the farmer does not get an enhanced value for his steers by reason of this tariff on hides, then what benefit will the shoe manufacturer get by taking it off? I suppose that the gentleman is going to contend that the middleman in the cattle business gets that profit.

Mr. PERKINS. Why, certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. He would not reduce his price with the tariff on, but if the tariff be taken off, if that be true he would, which I am not admitting.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly; he would have to meet the price of the South American hides with no tariff on; now he meets them with a tariff of 15 per cent on.

Mr. NORRIS. If that position be true, the only advantage that this legislation which you propose would have would be to take away the profit that goes to the middleman in the cattle business and give it to the man who manufactures shoes.

Mr. PERKINS. I think that is a fact. I think it would take it away from Armour & Co. and the members of the great beef combination and give it to those who employ a hundred thousand citizens in their manufactures.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I do not admit that.

Mr. PERKINS. I am only yielding to a question and not to an argument.

Mr. NORRIS. You do admit that in all instances where the farmer kills a steer and sells the hide separately from the meat he himself gets the benefit?

Mr. PERKINS. I think he ought to; I presume he often does. I do not know how far that price is controlled. I do not know how far the packers control that.

Mr. STERLING. I wish you would explain to us why it is that the farmer does not get the benefit of the tariff when he sells a carload of steers or a trainload of steers, as well as when he sells a single steer?

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will wait a minute, I intend to come to that.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Before getting away from this point I would like to just ask a further question in this connection. All through what we usually speak of as the Eastern States these packers have no establishment by which they sell steers, so is it not true that all through the East these hides are sold very largely by the individual producer?

Mr. PERKINS. No. I can only tell by what is done by the people of Rochester.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. You are speaking of the city. You do not raise steers in that city.

Mr. PERKINS. We have a country round about that raises steers. The business of raising steers in Monroe County has practically gone out of existence, because all the beef that is consumed there is brought in from Chicago.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am talking of what is done in the country in the East.

Mr. PERKINS. Ten years ago they raised steers; now they do not.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. But where they do raise them, I say, all through the East where they are, they have got concerns, I will say to the gentleman, and there is a little concern right in my own town that buys them by the hundreds of thousands every year.

Mr. PERKINS. Hundreds of thousands of what?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Domestic hides.

Mr. PERKINS. You do not buy the hides of hundreds of thousands of steers slaughtered in Vermont.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. No; but from the farmers in the East. That is what one concern does.

Mr. PERKINS. I presume you get a good many from the farmers of Chicago.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I would like to go a little further. I would like to take the State of Missouri. The State of Missouri is a great steer-producing State.

Mr. PERKINS. It is.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I would like to know, for information, and I would like to have the gentleman tell us, if he can, what proportion of the steers of that State go into the hands of those packers there living, and what part are slaughtered in that State, and the profits on the sales of the hides of which go to the producers. That is my question, Mr. Chairman, precisely.

Mr. BURLESON. In the same connection I am a little inclined to agree with the gentleman that the beef trust is the chief beneficiary of the tariff upon hides. When the gentleman reaches that part of his discussion, I would like him to explain if he can why, when the Dingley tariff bill was formulated, the argument was used that the farmer and stock raiser were to be benefited by this tariff.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand, there were two or three Senators from small Western States who thought they would be benefited by this and held up the bill unless a tariff on hides went in. It was not in the McKinley bill. Mr. McKinley did not believe in it; Mr. Blaine did not believe in it. But I have always been told that two or three Senators from some of the small western mountain and mineral States held up the Dingley bill until they got that duty on hides because they thought it would be some advantage to them.

Mr. BURLESON. They were mistaken about it, and the farmer and stock raiser were handed a gold brick.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; I think so; and it is not the first time. either, that the farmer has been handed a gold brick.

Mr. BURLESON. We agree with you thoroughly on that; they were handed a gold brick in the entire Dingley bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know about the Dingley bill, but I have in mind other bills.

Now, gentlemen, let us look to universal experience, to what we all know, to get some information. Does not everyone in this House know that there goes up a constant wail, and that the complaint has gone up just as strongly since the tax on hides as it ever did before concerning two things: First, that the people who buy beef have to pay too much? Certainly every gentleman in this House has heard that; and, secondly, that the men who sell steers do not get enough. Certainly there is not a Representative from the Western States who has not heard that. So it appears that the connection between the price for which animals sell and the price for which their products are sold is not very close.

Does any gentleman think that if the people who buy the bulk of the steers, and who have obtained a higher price for beef, will not give the benefit of that to the man who raises the steers—does any gentleman think that those same men, who will not give a cent more for steers when they put up the price of beef, will say, "If we can get a dollar more for hides, we will see that you get the full benefit of it?" If gentlemen believe that, there is no use in arguing further on that question. Here is the gentleman from North Dakota, whom I do not see here now, who in the last session introduced a resolution which he certainly supported by very strong argument, as to the manner in which the price of steers was controlled by the great packers, and he seemed to show that between the price at which beef was sold and the price for which cattle were bought there was no close or intimate connection. Does that show that the man who sells the steer gets the benefit of that part of the price of the animal?

Mr. HOGG. May I ask you a question?

Mr. PERKINS. You may. You know a great deal more than I do about all these things, and so, probably, I will not be able to answer your question.

Mr. HOGG. I know very little except what affects my people. Do you believe that removing the tariff on hides will benefit the man who raises the steers?

Mr. PERKINS. I think he will not get a single cent less for them.

Mr. HOGG. Do you wish the tariff on your manufactured shoes removed?

Mr. PERKINS. We do not care a bit for it.

Mr. HOGG. You are willing to have that taken off?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly. I do not know how it is about the cheaper grades, but I know that for the better grades of shoes they can be made in competition with any country in the world. We can not compete with Europe, I think, in making sabots, but our people have not yet got to the point where they wear sabots.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I wish to take issue with the gentleman from New York, because I would not be willing to stand here and admit that the shoe manufacturers of Massachusetts were willing to have the duty on the finished product removed. Sixty-five per cent of the manufacturers in my district would be, but the other 35 per cent could not stand it. They will concede a reduction, but they can not consent to the entire removal of it. It is not correct to say they do not care a snap for it.

Mr. PERKINS. Of course, everybody understands that I am not speaking for the gentleman from Massachusetts or for his constituents. I simply answer for myself and for those whom I represent.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I thought the gentleman was speaking for the shoe trade.

Mr. PERKINS. No; I have no right to speak for any other Member here, and it is unnecessary that I should.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What particular part of the shoe trade do you speak for, may I ask?

Mr. PERKINS. I will say that I understand that when it comes to the better class of boots and shoes they can be made more cheaply in the United States, and a man can get more for his money in a good class of American boots and shoes than he can get anywhere else in the world; and the proof of it is this: That boots and shoes are made in this country, after paying the duty on hides and all other duties, and then they are sent over and sold in London and in Paris, not cheaper than they are sold in this country as some products are, but they are sold for the price that they are sold in this country, and the cost of shipping them besides. And people buy them there. If the price of them was too high they could not be sold.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; although I hope to get through by 5 o'clock.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You will excuse me——

Mr. PERKINS. It is always a pleasure to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You will excuse me if I suggest that in that very interesting statement you have made you have not answered my question at all. What I should like to know is what particular branch of the shoe trade do you speak for when you say they are willing to have the tariff taken off of manufactured shoes? Now, I have shoe manufacturers in my district, and I would like to know what particular manufactories you speak for. If you speak for the leather trade, all right. If you speak for your part of it, why, likewise, all right.

Mr. PERKINS. I can only speak from what I have heard many shoe manufacturers say.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman will excuse me, will he please inform the House where these shoe manufacturers are located who are willing to have the tariff taken off from manufactured shoes?

Mr. PERKINS. I can say where sixty-five prosperous manufactories are located, and that is in the city of Rochester, representing $15,000,000 output.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And they are willing to have it taken off?

Mr. PERKINS. They can compete against the shoemakers of the world.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That does not quite answer the question. Are they willing to have the tariff taken off?

Mr. PERKINS. If it was necessary to have it taken off to get a reduction that will be of benefit to them, I will say yes. I do not suppose they want the tariff taken off shoes and the tariff kept on hides.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do I understand that the shoe producers in Rochester are willing to exchange the tariff they now have on their product for the tariff on hides, if the tariff on hides can be repealed?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman mean that the tariff on leather also has to be taken off?

Mr. PERKINS. Precisely.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, the gentleman did not say that.

Mr. PERKINS. Whether it is necessary also to take off the tariff on leather, turns on a very simple question. If leather can be sold in this country in a free market, the shoe manufacturer will get the entire benefit of the reduction of the duty and will buy hides and the product of hides coming from South America at 15 per cent less. If in the leather business a combination can control the entire product of manufactured leather, then the gentleman will see that there is a possibility—I do not say that they will exercise it, but there will be a possibility—if they can buy the whole output and sell the entire product, of obtaining for their own benefit such portions of this duty as they can. For myself I say that we will meet that when we come to it. We do not know that there is any such combination or ever will be, and my own belief is that any combination that has to meet the free importation of goods will find its hands pretty full if it attempts to keep up artificial prices in this line or in any line.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman know that the so-called "beef trust" is also very largely interested in the so-called "leather trust?"

Mr. PERKINS. I know it is said so, but just the same they came down here and said they were willing to have the duty on manufactured leather go off.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman state whether the bulk of the sole leather comes from abroad or whether it is produced in this country?

Mr. PERKINS. A great many hides come from this country and the excess comes from other countries. I do not think the bulk of the sole leather comes from abroad, but a large portion of it does.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman does not mean in the shape of leather; he must mean in hides.

Mr. PERKINS. I mean in hides.

Mr. MANN. In the shape of hides, of course.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the bulk of it is sole leather. Thick sole leather comes from abroad, comes from tropical countries, where such hides are necessary for the protection of the animals from insects.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands that we do not produce sole leather in the North, where the bulk of our sole leather is. I wanted, if I could, to find out from the gentleman just where he stood. A number of us have shoe manufacturers in our districts, and we ought to have some unanimity of sentiment if we are going to do anything. I would like to know whether the gentleman's manufacturers are willing to take the duty off shoes and continue to pay duty on sole leather?

Mr. PERKINS. I think if they could get the duty off hides they would not bother about the duty on leather.

Mr. MANN. The duty on sole leather. That is not hides.

Mr. PERKINS. I know that perfectly well. I said I thought if they could get the duty off hides they would take chances on sole leather.

Mr. MANN. My understanding has been that the duty on sole leather was more of a hardship on the shoe manufacturers than the duty on hides.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman understands that what they buy is sole leather. The shoe manufacturer does not buy hides. The hide is turned into leather and he buys the leather. The theory is, of course, if you reduce the price of hides you reduce the price of leather.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the Central Leather Company, of which Mr. Ballentyne and his brother-in-law, Mr. Armour, are the promoters, have secured the American Hide and Leather Company, a competing company, and is in a position to maintain the prices on sole leather so long as the 20 per cent duty is permitted them by the United States? And is it not true, contrary to information which is given here, that the greater part of our sole leather that goes into good shoes is made from packer hides and not from imported hides, and that practically no sole leather whatever is imported?

Mr. PERKINS. No hides that are made into sole leather——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will say this: That the Argentine hides are imported, but they are of a very inferior class and go into what we call red leather. It is true they are sometimes bleached and put into a fair class of shoes—a class of shoes with which we are quite familiar from the advertisements. They sometimes use Argentine hides, but the fact is that the hides which go into the sole leather, which go into the shoes that each one of you gentlemen have on here, almost without exception comes from packer hides.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Does the gentleman hold that if the tariff is removed from hides it would make this class of cheaper shoes of which he speaks any cheaper to the consumer?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know that it would. I am not arguing that now. I am arguing simply the question of what the effect is of the duty on hides to manufacturers and who gets the benefit.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman said a while ago that this cheaper class of shoes is the class of shoes that was bearing the burden of this tariff.

Mr. PERKINS. In answer to that—and then, with the permission of gentlemen, I think I shall ask them to allow me ten minutes without interruption, in which time I can finish what I have to say, and then I shall be very happy to discuss it with them—in answer to the question put by the gentleman from Illinois, when it comes to the effect of an increase of cost, and when this reaches the consumer, the gentleman knows that is one of the most difficult questions. There is often a small increase in cost to the manufacturer, and no increase in cost to the consumer. That frequently occurs.

On the other hand, there are frequently times when the cost of the manufacture being pushed up so high, the percentage of profit being brought down so low, the manufacturer finally turns round and says that he will endeavor to get the cost out of the consumer. The cost came out of the consumer in the various rises in the price of coal. There is no doubt about that. That we all know from actual experience. I do not say that if 2 cents were taken off the cost of shoes necessarily or probably a shoe that is now selling at $2 would then sell at $1.98. I think it is most unlikely. But I say, as to this item of cost to the manufacturers, that the time comes sooner or later when either the manufacturer quits the trade or he makes the consumer pay more, and when he makes him pay more for the price of shoes, if the price of shoes is pushed up ultimately, as a result of the effect of this duty, it will not go up 2 cents as we all know, but when it goes up it will go up 5 cents or 10 cents a pair.

Whether he ought to do it, whether it is right or wrong, I am not here to say, but we are discussing as practical men a practical business question.

Now, in the ten minutes which I have asked for, if the gentlemen will kindly give them to me, I want to appeal to another argument as to whether the man who raises the steer gets the benefit of the duty on hides. I think it is not an overstatement to say that 99 per cent of the cattle that are slaughtered in the United States are sold on the hoof. Of course, occasionally there is a man who slaughters his steer and, as I have said, sells the hide separately and sells the beef separately, but I think it is not an overstatement that 99 per cent of the cattle sold in the United States are sold on the hoof. They are sold by the pound. The meat that is in them, the hide that is on them, the water that has very recently been pumped into them—all go to form an entirety of weight upon which the price is based.

We will say the price of steers would be naturally 6 cents a pound. The difference in the value of a steer resulting from the increased cost of the hide, the increased value of the hide, at 15 per cent, calling the hides, say, 10 cents a pound, would be about one-sixteenth of 1 cent per pound of the steer. Does any gentleman here really believe that when the agent of the great packers go out and buy steers by the hundreds of thousands they say that the fair price of the beef is 6 cents a pound, but we remember that by reason of the duty on hides we will get on this animal for the hide as a by-product about a dollar and a half more on the whole animal that perhaps sells at $90, and so, instead of giving you 6 cents a pound, the price of a steer at Kansas City shall be six and one-sixteenth cents a pound? Such a phenomenon, Mr. Chairman, has never been seen in all the annals of all the records of the sales of steers in any of the great emporiums.

Let us look at another thing. Of course the selling price of cattle at the great centers is the price of cattle everywhere. If a man has a steer on his own farm, he has to sell it at the price that is fixed at the great centers, as is the case with wheat and any other commodity. Has the price of steers gone up by reason of the duty on hides? I can read figures here for half an hour, but I will only take half a dozen. I think I have taken the figures fairly, because I have endeavored to make a fair statement to-day before this House and not a garbled statement.

A garbled statement does no man good and no cause good. In 1893, for instance, before there was any duty on hides, steers were selling at 6 cents; hides at 9 cents. In 1897 beef was selling at 5 cents and a fraction as the average price for some months; hides at 9 cents. In 1899, after the duty was on, hides at one portion of the year were selling at 11 cents, in December, 1900, running up to 13 cents, and steers were selling on the hoof at 6 cents per pound, just what they were selling at when hides were bringing 9 cents a pound.

Well, now, Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman, in the face of these figures, sees fit to say the benefit of the tax on hides has gone to the man who sells the steer it seems to me that you might tell him two and two make four and he would question the statement. I am a good enough Republican to still believe in Mr. Blaine as a great Republican. When this same item was up in the McKinley bill, I believe the man who did most to keep it out of the McKinley bill was Mr. James G. Blaine, and I have here his statement protesting against a duty on hides, in which he said:

> It will yield a profit only to the butcher, the last man who needs it.

That was in 1890. Since that time has grown up the great combination of beef packers in the West and Central West, and certainly if the butcher would get the benefit in 1890, in 1905, with these great combinations, he would get it more. If he was the man in 1890 who needed it least he needs it still least when he is helped by vast combinations against which I have nothing to say except certainly they do not need to be the beneficiaries of the protective tariff. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word more on one or two other subjects, on which I will be very brief. I had no idea of wearying the committee so long. But there are one or two things I want to suggest, because I have introduced many times—not with very sanguine hopes, but in the confidence that sooner or later, some time later, but some time, the right will prevail—a bill taking off the tax on lumber, about which I want to say just one word.

Now, that is very simple. There is not a man in this House whose mail is not flooded, and properly flooded, with papers from forestry conventions, from forestry congresses, with speeches from the President of the United States down to the humblest ranger, protesting against the great harm done by cutting off with too great rapidity the forests of the United States. There is not anybody who does not know that much harm has been done already, and that more harm will be done in the future, and it certainly does seem strange that when on one side we are told of the evil from the too rapid stripping of the forests of the United States, the evil to agriculture, the evil to every interest, we should at the same time insist upon hindering coming into this country any foot of wood that would save the consumption of a foot of wood cut from the forests of this land. Furthermore, who pays that tax? That is simpler than the tax on hides.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I make a suggestion to my friend right here? If I get the purport of the argument the gentleman is now making, it is that the more you eliminate the lumber industry the more you perpetuate the forests. That is the substance of it, is it not?

Mr. PERKINS. I say that the fewer trees that are cut off the more will remain standing. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The more you eliminate the lumber industry and the manufacture of the trees that are cut off, the more trees you will have standing. Now, the gentleman can get that proposition in the original Wilson report that accompanied the Wilson bill, where they justified the removal of the tariff on the lumber on the ground that while the industry might be eliminated the forests would be preserved.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, this thing I can say, Mr. Chairman, and it will be quite clear. Everybody knows the price of building a frame house is much more than it was a few years ago. There are hundreds of thousands of people in this land who build houses that are made of lumber, and anything that will reduce the price of lumber will be of benefit to a very large portion of the population of the United States. No man can deny that a reduction in the cost of lumber that will cheapen the cost of building a frame house will benefit a great number of people.

Now, who gets the benefit of hemlock selling at, say, twenty-four or twenty-five dollars per thousand, perhaps, when it used to sell at twelve or thirteen dollars per thousand? This statement certainly no man can contravene, that the great bulk of the forests of the United States, the great bulk of the timber lands, belong to a few, a comparatively few, very rich men and very rich corporations. I do not say that it is any crime for a man to be a very rich man; it is no crime for a corporation to be rich and powerful; but I say, Mr. Chairman, that when a duty is kept upon the protective tariff of the United States, the benefit of which goes to a very few men who are very rich, the cost of which falls upon a very great number of people who are not rich at all, that form of protective law in my humble judgment, will not last forever. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have talked longer than I should, and I will say one thing in closing. I have talked about hides, and I wish to add that I have only expressed views that met the approval, without speaking of others, of William McKinley and James G. Blaine. I am a very humble member of the Republican party, and the mantle of McKinley and Blaine as protection leaders is certainly quite broad enough to cover me.

In the second place, the county which I have the honor to represent in Congress gave the largest majority for Theodore Roosevelt of any county in the great State of New York. If we are not Republicans, I do not know who are Republicans. The city which I represent adds largely to the wealth of the United States; the county which I represent adds largely to the majority of the Republican party, and we have a right to come here like good citizens and good Republicans and ask for legislation that shall not do us harm, but good. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, there are doubtless many Members of this House who are disappointed to learn that a deficiency bill has been brought in appropriating an amount in excess of $15,000,000. It was thought that the provision incorporated in the appropriation bill last winter, imposing severe penalties upon officials who involved the Government in exxpenditures without authority from Congress, would very materially diminish appropriations for deficiencies in the future. An analysis of this bill, however, gives ground for the assertion that very material improvement has been made by the legislation of last winter. The aggregate amount of this bill, something over $15,000,000, is still less by $12,000,000 than the deficiency appropriations of the last session of Congress, and less by $7,000,000 than those of the year before. While, no doubt, another deficiency bill will be brought in before the close of the session, there is every indication that it will not include a very considerable amount. It should also be noticed that in this bill there are several items belonging to permanent appropriations or of an exceptional nature, which go far to make up the amount.

In the first category are $1,500,000 for the expenses of collecting revenue from customs, $1,400,000 for payment of judgments by the Court of Claims, and $3,500,000 for payment of pensions; in the second, an amount in excess of $5,000,000 for the construction of the isthmian canal. So that the total amount of deficiencies proper, not for necessary and extraordinary expenditures or exceptional in their nature, included in this bill amounts to only $3,475,000.

There is one thing, however, upon which we ought all to agree, and that is the adoption of the proposed amendment, which makes more severe and more comprehensive the penalty for those officials who authorize the expenditure of money not authorized by Congress. It seems that the provisions of the bill of last winter, though to an extent effective, are nevertheless not absolutely effective. There are some deficiency appropriations which are unavoidable. They are made up of expenditures required for the essential operations of the Government, the extent and the expense of which can not be anticipated. They should not include operations not authorized by Congress or the enlargement of those already existing. The most troublesome class of deficiencies arises from instances in which executive officers of the Government authorize expenditures clearly not within the contemplation of Congress; and in this connection it should also be said it is not the right of an executive officer to create a standard of expenditures based upon his own ideas as to what the efficiency of the service requires or the promptness with which the work should be done. If that were allowed, we would have a multitude of different standards, according to the different ideas in each Department or Bureau of the Government.

While a certain number of deficiency appropriations are absolutely necessary and can not be avoided, it must be conceded that they are dangerous to an orderly and economical administration of affairs, and should in every possible way be avoided. Under existing laws, 188 objects—at least that is the number enumerated in a report made in 1893—are provided for by what are called permanent or indefinite appropriations. No action is necessary on the part of Congress to provide for their payment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Two hundred and twenty.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I am corrected by the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the Appropriations Committee. The number is 188, as stated in the report of 1893.

Very careful provision has been made for these necessary and essential expenses of the Government. In the list is included interest on the public debt, expenses of national loans, including the printing of the currency of the country, refunding the national debt, the sinking fund, the refunding of moneys erroneously received, drawbacks under the tariff act, payment for stamps which have been destroyed or burned or improperly canceled.

There are kindred provisions for expenditures under the War and Interior Departments. We may find an excellent illustration under the Navy Department. Sixty dollars is allowed to a seaman on a boat sunk or destroyed by fire, as an allowance for his clothing. That allowance is payable out of the Treasury without any appropriation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Other than this permanent annual appropriation.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is included in permanent appropriations and requires no action by Congress. The question may well be raised whether we have not too many of these indefinite and permanent appropriations. The argument in favor of them is that the operations of government which are essential should be carried on with just as little embarrassment as possible; that whenever there is a claim or expenditure, payment for which is provided by law, such payment should be made without waiting for the action of Congress. There is another argument based upon methods of legislative procedure, namely, that it is desirable to eliminate, as far as possible, the consideration of appropriations undisputed in their nature, so that the efforts of committees and the time of the House in Committee of the Whole may be given to subjects upon which questions of policy annually arise.

There are glaring incongruities in the law. There is an amount appropriated by a permanent appropriation for the collection of customs—$5,500,000 a year, if I am not incorrect in the figures, or $2,750,000 semiannually—while for the collection of internal revenue and the expenses connected with that department appropriations have to be made each year. So the collection of these two kinds of revenue is provided for in a manner entirely different.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say, for the information of the committee, that the House in the last Congress, in an appropriation bill, passed a provision repealing the permanent appropriation for the collection of the customs revenue, but in the Senate it was stricken out, and the House was unable to have its way in regard to it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Possibly the gossip in regard to that subject may be true, and possibly not. It is to the effect that that provision for a permanent appropriation for the customs service was enacted at a time when it was feared that some future Congress would be unfriendly to the tariff and would very much hamper the administration of the customs law. At any rate, the provision was made more than thirty years ago.

One of the dangers of deficiency bills is that executive officers who have sent in their estimates, after those estimates have been carefully considered by Congress and certain items recommended by them have been rejected, will, unless the law is very severe, go ahead and expend the amounts which they recommended, notwithstanding the adverse action of Congress. It is fit and proper that by the severest penalties we should provide against that possibility. It is for this Congress to determine what provision shall be made for the different Departments and branches of the public service. The responsibility rests with us. In the early days of the Government executive officers exercised a larger degree of liberty than now. On a former occasion I stated to the House that the first appropriation bill, in 1789, occupied only twelve and a half lines. For the first eleven years of the Government appropriation bills were very brief; all expenses were provided in one bill for a time. It was not until the year 1800 that a rule was enforced for the presentation of estimates and accounts of what money had been expended. Before then it was within the power of heads of Departments to appoint subordinates, to create offices, to raise salaries, and apportion the amounts for their respective Departments; but under later methods, as well as under any well-regulated system of finance, the tendency has been toward greater minuteness and examination of details by Congress. Divers measures have been passed; in 1868, one forbidding the transfer of appropriations from one branch of the public service to another. This had a sweeping effect. Senator Sherman, in some remarks in 1870, made the assertion that it was the plan of the Admiral of the Navy to build a navy from amounts that were left over in the Navy Department from appropriations made in the civil war and succeeding years. By the statutes of 1870 and 1874 other provisions were enacted by which, after a lapse of two years, barring certain exceptional classes of appropriations, money unexpended was to be covered back into the Treasury. And it is desirable that we should still further continue this same tendency by holding the executive officers of the Government to the strictest responsibility. The phraseology used in the proposed amendment is, "Executive Department or other Government establishments of the United States," because by a decision of the Attorney-General "Executive Department" was not considered broad enough.

There is one serious objection to deficiency appropriations to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. It is based upon the method of consideration of money bills by different committees. Whether it is wise or not the appropriation bills are apportioned among divers committees. It was not so formerly. In a deficiency bill, in the very nature of the case, questions can be considered by only one committee. Everything focuses on that committee—Post-Office, Agriculture, Army, Navy—every distinct branch of the Government for which there is expenditure and for which the committee makes report. It must inevitably be the case that many of the reports and estimates relating to deficiencies must be considered by a committee which did not have the original consideration of the items of appropriation to which they relate, and which can not have as thorough and complete information on the subject as the one to which it was first submitted. There are other subjects on which perhaps I might speak to the committee, but as the hour is late I do not wish to weary your patience.

I want to say in closing that if there is one duty that rests on this House of Representatives it is to guard the public purse. If we abdicate that responsibility we destroy the greatest field of usefulness which belongs to us. In the development of modern civilization greater liberty has been obtained, greater privileges for the people, from the control of expenditures by the representatives of the people than in any other way. Writs of habeas corpus may have been provided to secure the freedom of the subject or citizen, but in those triumphs that tend to build up the individual and destroy despotic or irresponsible power the most important step has been the giving more and more to the representatives of the people the right to determine for what objects expenditures shall be made and how much shall be expended. The body that is nearest to the people can not shirk this responsibility. This is not said in criticism of any other branch of the Government. It is merely said to emphasize the fact that a duty rests here which we must perform or the whole machinery of this Government will get out of gear. We shall be efficient and worthy of confidence or inefficient and lacking in our duty in proportion as we scrutinize the public expenditures and make sure that they are applied to purposes which approve themselves to our judgment and to the judgment of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him if he has ever given consideration to the proposition of some one committee in the House making practically a budget and assigning to the various other committees that make appropriations an amount beyond which they shall not go, and that total assignment being made on the basis of the estimated revenue, or whether he thinks it would be wise to keep right on, each independent appropriation committee expending or reporting for expenditures such amounts as they see fit? I refer to the gentleman's own committee, as well as to the Committee on Military Affairs and the other appropriation committees.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I desire to say that I do not wish to make any remarks here with a view to increase the prerogatives of my own committee. That must take care of itself. I have advocated a committee, made up of the chairmen of the different committees of appropriations, to meet together and keep in touch with the situation and consider the total amount of revenue, the total amount of expenditure, and the share which should be apportioned to each.

Mr. PERKINS. That, of course, is the procedure of the English Parliament.

Mr. BURTON. Practically; it is more concentrated there.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but it is practically that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That goes by cabinet largely.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12320—the urgent deficiency bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, to meet to-morrow, Saturday, January 20, 1906, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Annie Mahar, remarried widow of Theodore S. Loveland, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 20, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FEDERAL COURT AT GRAND ISLAND, NEBR.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3127) providing for the holding of Federal court at Grand Island, Nebr.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3127) providing for the holding of Federal court at Grand Island, Nebr.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act there shall be a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States within and for the State and district of Nebraska held in the city of Grand Island, in said State, commencing on the second Monday of April in each year: Provided, however, That suitable rooms and accommodations are furnished for the holding of said courts at said place free of expense to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether this is a unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. NORRIS. In reply to the gentleman I will say the Judiciary Committee made a unanimous report on this bill at the last session of Congress, the bill being then before the committee. It passed this House, but it was not considered in the Senate, and was reintroduced into this Congress and is now before the House with another unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. How much expense does it add?

Mr. NORRIS. No expense whatever. It provides there shall be none.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not understand to what bill the gentleman referred.

Mr. NORRIS. The bill provides for the holding of a term of the United States court at Grand Island, Nebr.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I will state my recollection is the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously agreed on the bill. I recollect reporting it myself. There is no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NORRIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING IN RECORD OF RESOLUTIONS OF AN ALASKAN CONVENTION.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time to present and to have printed in the RECORD the resolutions of the Alaskan convention recently held, they being very brief and setting forth their needs and desires as they see them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions of an Alaskan convention. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What kind of convention was this?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman that this was a convention held by the people of Alaska at which seventy-two delegates from all over that immense Territory were present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There was no politics in it?

Mr. CUSHMAN. It was absolutely nonpartisan.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What was the purpose of the convention?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The purpose was twofold. First, to get an expression from the people all over Alaska setting forth what they consider to be their needs in the matter of legislation, certain changes in the mining law, additional appropriations for various purposes, building roads, etc., being a succinct statement of what they considered necessary. Second, the selection of three informal delegates to come to Washington City to present their needs as best they might to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to object to these requests, but they are coming in here almost every day asking to print some memorial or something else in the RECORD, and I think we had better adhere to the rules of the House, that have worked well for years, and I do not know why this should be made at this time an exception.

Mr. LACEY. Let me suggest to my friend from New York that Alaska is not represented on the floor, and they have sent a committee here to talk about the various Alaskan affairs, and this resolution shows the standing these parties coming here have, and whatever strength they may have, and it ought to be put in the RECORD, so as to be easily ascertained, instead of merely going formally through the petition box.

Mr. CUSHMAN. And also, Mr. Speaker, the resolution, when printed, ought to be of great value and assistance to the House Committee on the Territories, as being the most concise and succinct statement from the people of Alaska as to what they consider they need that has yet been made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will not object to this.

Mr. CUSHMAN. It is very brief.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, not to prolong the debate, I will say that it can very easily be gotten into the RECORD under the rules of the House, and I do not know why we should set them aside in order to get it in. If it is necessary to have it printed for the Committee on Territories, I will say that I remember the other day they got leave to print what was necessary for the use of the committee. So I will have to object.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. It was necessary for him to go to Alaska a few years ago to get information. Here we may get knowledge without anyone going there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objects.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SABINE RIVER.

Mr. BROOCKS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill (S. 2159) of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2159) authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROOCKS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 12320—the urgent deficiency bill—and pending that motion I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] whether we can not come to an agreement this morning to close the general debate at the end of one hour, permitting the gentleman from Georgia to control one-half of the time and one-half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we could end it in an hour on this side. I do not know how much time the gentleman desires on his side.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman require a full hour on his side?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think so.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, then I make the motion that general debate be closed within two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia and the other hour to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed upon this bill within two hours. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. LITTAUER that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 12320—the urgent deficiency bill—with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, on the 19th of December last, on the report of the Committee on Accounts, I called attention to the fact, which had existed before that time, that the stenographers to committees are frequently engaged and outside stenographers were employed and that the fees of the latter ought to be limited to some amount.

Since that time I have received a letter, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read. It seems that the state of affairs which I criticised has been remedied almost absolutely by legislation of two years ago, and that last session of Congress only about $800 was spent for outside work. I ask to have the letter read in justice to this corps of official stenographers to committees.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICIAL STENOGRAPHERS TO COMMITTEES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1906.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Regarding the statement made by yourself in debate in the House on December 19 last as to large bills for outside stenographic work before your committee, permit us respectfully and in perfect good nature to suggest that the condition you referred to did exist prior to three years ago, but does not exist now. Two years ago the corps of committee stenographers was increased from two members to four, and in consequence of that increase only $853 was paid out by the House for all committees at the last session for outside stenographic work. That work was not done by ourselves because at the time we were engaged in reporting hearings before other committees.

At the last session no money whatever was paid out for such service before your committee, and at this session thus far no outside work has been done for any House committee.

If further details concerning this subject are desired, it will give us pleasure to supply them.

We have the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

W. J. KEHOE,
M. R. BLUMENBERG,
JOHN D. CREMER,
H. F. DODGE,
Committee Stenographers.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman from Georgia use part of his time now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of discussing this appropriation bill. I have asked this concession of time in order to protest against an Executive order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. An order which, in my opinion, is not necessary for the orderly and efficient conduct of his Department, which is not calculated to promote the public convenience and security, and which has proven to be a very serious obstacle to the enforcement of the criminal laws in the several States. In order that the House may understand at the outset just what these objections are, I will say that, acting under the authority of the Revised Statutes, the Secretary of the Treasury has issued an order to the several deputy internal-revenue collectors forbidding them to give copies of special tax receipts issued to retail liquor dealers for use in prosecution before the State courts. The authority for making this order is contained in sections 161 and 251 of the Revised Statutes, which are as follows:

SEC. 161. The head of each Department is authorized to prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his Department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

SEC. 251. The Secretary of the Treasury shall make and issue from time to time such instructions and regulations to the several collectors, etc., as he shall deem best calculated to promote the public convenience and security and to protect the United States as well as individuals from fraud or loss, etc.

I do not question the authority of the Commissioner to make this order, because the Supreme Court of the United States has already passed on it and upheld it in the case of Boske v. Comingore (177 U. S.), but I do protest against the exercise of the authority in the manner and to the extent to which this order goes. It is a long order, and I will not read it all, but here is an extract from it, and the particular part of it about which I am complaining:

Collectors are hereby prohibited from giving out any special-tax records or any copies thereof to private persons or to local officers, or to produce such records or copies thereof in a State court, whether in answer to subpœnas duces tecum or otherwise. Whenever such subpœnas shall have been served upon them, they will appear in court in answer thereto and respectfully decline to produce the records called for on the ground of being prohibited therefrom by the regulations of this Department.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him. You do not understand that the public is denied access to the list of internal-revenue taxpayers in each district, do you?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. This list is kept in the proper office of the district?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. And that is open to inspection?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. By anyone who cares to go and make a list or make a copy of the persons who pay this tax?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is true. It is true because the statute requires it. It was the intention of the Congress that these facts should not be kept secret, and in my opinion for that reason, and for that reason only, they are open to inspection. What I object to is the refusal of the officer who has this list to testify in a State court or to give a copy either of the list which the law requires him to keep or a copy of the tax receipts which he has issued. Without this rule he would be required to do that; without this rule, in fact, and without this amendment—for the rule is in effect an amendment to the statute—he did refuse, and the courts required him to furnish copies. That came up in a case from the State of Connecticut, In re Hirsh, reported in the seventy-fourth Federal Reporter. The protection of privilege is extended to these records by an order of the Treasury Department and not by the rules of evidence; and against that I protest.

I can understand why the records of the internal-revenue collector's office should be protected against the process of the subpœna duces tecum. At any rate, I am making no complaint against that protection now. I believe under the decisions of our court their records would be sufficiently protected against any undue annoyance by reason of this subpœna without the interposition of this rule.

Under the statutes of a number of States the possession of a special-tax receipt which the revenue collector issues to retail liquor dealers is prima facie evidence of a sale of liquor, and before the Secretary made the order which I am now criticising the revenue collectors could be forced to give copies of these receipts for use in prosecutions in the State courts, and this order of the Secretary was promulgated solely for the purpose of extending the protection of privilege to these records. This, I believe, is an unwarranted use of the authority which the statute gives to the Secretary, "to make regulations which he shall deem best calculated to promote the public convenience and security and protect the United States, as well as individuals, from fraud and loss."

There are two reasons why public records are protected from scrutiny by the processes of the courts, and two reasons only. This whole matter was thrashed out in this country many years ago in the trial of Aaron Burr, down at Richmond, when Chief Justice Marshall presided at that court. There was an application made there for a subpœna duces tecum against Thomas Jefferson, then President, for certain papers. After the whole matter had been most elaborately and fully discussed before the court, Chief Justice Marshall decided that even the President of the United States could be required to testify, and that the subpœna could go against him. The two reasons, and the only two reasons, which give to public records the protection of privilege are, first, that it may result in such inconvenience to require the officers to leave their executive offices and carry with them their records as to interfere materially with the proper performance of the duties of their office; and for that reason they may reply to the subpœna that it is not possible to obey it without neglecting public business. The courts hold that this relates to the return, to the answer that may be made, and has no reference to the authority of the court to issue the subpœna. It was further held that if the President could not attend as directed or that the records could not be taken from their proper offices, he had a right to answer the subpœna by a certified copy of the record, and that that would be a complete answer.

The other reason is that if public records were subject to the processes of all the courts, it might result in making public secrets of the Government which should not be made public; and the courts have held that in such case the officer summoned may answer the subpœna by the statement that the public interests require that the matter be kept secret.

If the rule of the Secretary be amended—and I have introduced a bill for that purpose, so as to require the revenue collectors to give copies of the tax receipts which he issues—then the first reason will not apply. He will not have to leave his office, and his records will not have to leave the office. Now, as to the other reason, that it might make public certain records which ought to be kept secret. In reply to the gentleman from Vermont a few moments ago I stated that the statute requires the collector of internal revenue to publish an alphabetical list of those who pay the retail liquor-dealer's tax, so that there is therefore no secret which may be divulged. The secret is already made public. What he does refuse to do is to give a copy of that list or to give a copy of the receipt which he issues. Here is the statute as it is to-day, and I propose to amend it by adding the words "and shall make and preserve," etc. I will read the section as it would be if amended:

SEC. 3240. Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid.

Now, I propose to amend by adding these words:

and shall make and preserve a duplicate of the tax receipt or receipts issued to any person, company, or corporation, and upon application of any person he shall furnish a certified copy thereof, as of a public record, for which a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested may be charged.

The protection of privilege, Mr. Chairman, is a very sacred one, and should be guarded with great jealousy. In the very earliest stages of the processes which finally ripened into the common law it became necessary in the administration of justice to declare certain communications to be privileged even from the scrutiny of the courts. Among the first of these were statements made by a client to his attorneys, but the reason for this was then and is now apparent. Lawyers are officers of the court, and in order that they may not be hampered and handicapped in the discharge of their very high office it is necessary that in their conferences with their clients there be the fullest and freest communication, and to this end their clients must know that under the rules of law the attorney not only can not be required, but will not be permitted to divulge any secrets which they may communicate to him. But there are exceptions even to this rule. The protection of privilege is denied even to this character of communications when they relate to an intended offense against the law.

Wharton, in his Criminal Evidence, after laying down the rule I have just stated, adds this:

It is scarcely necessary to add that when the lawyer connives at the criminal purpose he so far loses his professional character as to preclude him personally from claiming any privilege.

In some of our States communications to the holy father made at the confessional are privileged, but even in these States the courts have held that protection of privilege does not extend to communications made under such extraordinary conditions if they refer to some offense intended or disclose some crime contemplated. Under the rule, however, which the Secretary of the Treasury has made for the internal-revenue collectors the protection which is denied to the lawyer, to the secret confided to the priest, is secured to the whisky dealer who declares his intention to the internal-revenue collector to engage in the business of law breaking for the revenue he expects to get out of it. The excuse which is given for this order—I say excuse, because it is not entitled to be called a reason—is that the information which the applicant for this special tax receipt gives the Government is given under compulsion, and therefore it would not be fair for the Government to divulge the secret which it forces from him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not under compulsion at all, and the Government owes the man who takes it no duty whatever. He is not required to engage in the illicit business. He determines that matter for himself, and the only compulsion the Government subjects him to is to comply with certain rules relating to his application for the tax receipt after he has finally determined to embark in his unlawful enterprise. Let us examine the matter critically and see if the Government owes him any sort of duty or any sort of protection. Under our first internal-revenue act of 1794 these taxes were called "internal-revenue license." They were called "license" in the act of 1813. They were called "license" in the act of 1864. Perhaps due to that fact certain parties claimed that they had a right, if they had a Federal license, to engage in the business of a retail liquor dealer without reference to State laws. Others claimed that the States alone had the right to issue license to retail liquor dealers, and therefore any Federal law on the subject was unconstitutional and the tax could not be collected. The whole matter was thrashed out in the License Cases, reported in 5 Wallace, and the court held that there was no authority earthly given or attempted to be given to the man who paid the tax; that he took it with the full understanding that he had no right from it to go into a State and engage in the business of a retail liquor dealer against the laws of the State. The Congress, however, to prevent any further possible misconception in the mind of any man who paid this tax that he was being licensed by reason of the fact that the tax was called a license, in 1866 amended the law and struck out the word "license" and inserted the words "special tax," so that since then no man who pays that tax can have any reason, in the face of the express decisions of the Supreme Court and in the face of the amendments of the act itself by Congress, to suppose that the Government of the United States is undertaking to authorize him in any manner, shape, or form to go into the States and violate the statutes of the States.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Has the court ever decided that the fact that any individual paid this tax and a receipt was issued to him operated as a license to this individual to go into a prohibition State or a local-option district and engage in the business of retail liquor selling?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; the court in the cases reported in 5 Wallace, the "License cases," as they are called, has decided exactly the contrary—that it is no authority earthly to any man to go into the States and violate the State law.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand they have so decided.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. One moment. Has the gentleman from Mississippi some bill on the subject of these receipts that are issued? I was not in the Hall when the gentleman commenced his remarks.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; I have a bill. I introduced it in the Fifty-eighth Congress, and it went to sleep in the committee room of the Committee on Ways and Means. I reintroduced it in this Congress, and it is asleep yet. I hope to wake it up, if I can. The bill simply amends section 3240 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that the internal-revenue collectors shall keep an alphabetical list, and so forth. It provides, in addition to that, that they shall give a certified copy of the special-tax receipts when they are called for and when the fee required is paid.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the bill prohibit the person to whom the receipt is issued from engaging in the business of retailing liquor in local-option precincts or prohibition States?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The special-tax receipt does not authorize anybody to engage in the whisky business anywhere. The statute now on the statute book provides that the payment of this tax shall in no way be taken as authority or a license to sell whisky in the States where there is local option or in States where the laws forbid its sale. I will read the statute:

SEC. 3243. The payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws for carrying on any trade or business shall not be held to exempt any person from any penalty or punishment provided by the laws of any State for carrying on the same within such State, or in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade or business contrary to the laws of such State or in places prohibited by municipal law; nor shall the payment of any such tax be held to prohibit any State from placing a duty or tax on the same trade or business for State or other purposes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that is right, and that is in conformity with the present law, which authorizes the State to act on this question under their police power, along the lines of the Hepburn and Dolliver bill reported by the Judiciary Committee last winter.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, the Hepburn and Dolliver bill invites me to go into pretty deep water. I will not discuss that at this time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not mean to precipitate a discussion of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, but I will state that the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously reported a bill last session which I think all the Members of Congress could stand on.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is there any law or Department order forbidding the furnishing of this information by the Federal officials to the State courts?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is an absolute order which I have just read, and which was evidently made in response to a decision of the Federal court in Connecticut, which required the local collector of internal revenue to give the information. Prior to that time there was a letter issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in which he gave it as his opinion that these local collectors of internal revenue were not required to give any information to the State courts and that they should refuse. The court said that that was the Commissioner's opinion, but it was not the opinion of the court, and held that it was not the law. Then the Commissioner of Internal Revenue issued this order, which he was authorized to do, and which the court has since held he had a right to do, and in this opinion (Boske v. Comingore, 177 U. S.) they held that having the authority to issue this order, the order had the force and effect of law and absolutely forbids the local revenue collectors from giving this information.

Mr. ADAMSON. And your bill would annul that order?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My bill would; my bill requires him to give the information.

Mr. ADAMSON. And requires the information to be given under a certificate?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman think that the mischief can be remedied, in case his bill passes, by legislation on the part of the several States fixing the admissibility and weight of the certificate as evidence?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A number of States have taken the matter up and have legislated that the payment of the tax and the possession of this receipt is prima facie evidence that the party paying it and holding it is engaged in the retail liquor business.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only thing necessary to make a perfect remedy in these States is to pass your bill?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; that is all, and the only thing that stands in the way is the rule issued by the executive department which runs counter to the rules of evidence that have prevailed in this country and in England from the foundation of the common law to this good day.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the date of that order?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not know the date, and I do not know it on purpose, for this reason: That if I knew the date it was issued I would know whether it was issued by a Democrat or a Republican, and I would not make the inquiry because I did not want to know. It is not a partisan question, and I do not think partisanship ought to enter into it. It was made by either a Democrat or a Republican, and which, I decline to investigate to find out.

Mr. NORRIS. It evidently was not made by a Prohibitionist. [Laughter.] I think the bill that the gentleman introduced is a proper one, but it occurred to me that the Treasury Department would not make a rule that would be effective against the order of the court.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It occurs to me to be so too; but in the case of Boske v. Comingore, which came up from the State of Kentucky, where an assessor was attempting to get certain information from the internal-revenue collector as to the amount of whisky some distiller had in the bonded warehouse, the court held that it could not be done because of this order which the Commissioner had issued. In another case, In re Lamberton, in 124 Federal Reporter, Judge Rogers, of Arkansas, decided that this order had the force and effect of law, and he said he decided it with regret; but the rule had been made, and the authority for making the rule had been upheld in Boske v. Comingore, and therefore he was helpless, and that nothing short of legislation could remedy it.

To return, Mr. Chairman, to the point I was discussing before I was diverted by these interruptions, that it is unfair to the party who pays this tax to give information that may lead to his conviction.

In view of the statutes which I have read and the opinion of the courts holding that the taxpayer has no authority to sell liquor derived from the payment of this tax, the internal-revenue collector declares, in effect, to every applicant for this special tax, when he issues him his receipt, that he takes it with the distinct understanding that the Government of the United States is in no way, manner, shape, or form giving him authority to carry on his business in defiance of the State laws, and it is folly to say under such circumstances that the Government owes him a duty to protect him against any proceeding which the State authorities see proper to institute if he does engage in an unlawful business. The statute, however, goes further than this: It provides, as a matter of law, that the revenue collectors must make public the fact that the applicant has paid the tax required of retail liquor dealers, and must further state at what place the applicant proposes to do business. I will reread the section as it stands to-day:

SEC. 3240. Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid.

This being true, how can the Secretary of the Treasury justify this rule which says, in effect, to the State authorities: "Richard Roe has declared to us that he is going into your State and engage in the business of retail liquor dealer. I have the record evidence of that fact in my office. You are entitled to it under the rules of evidence which have come down to us from the time whence the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. These rules are commended for their justness, for their fairness, for their accuracy, by the wisdom of all the judges who have adorned the bench of this country, and no legislator has ever dared to propose a bill that would change them; but what the legislators dared not do, what the jurists would not do, I have done by an executive order to prevent the conviction of men who have deliberately entered upon the business of violating your State laws for the money there is in it to them."

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, the gentleman wants to stop the sale of intoxicating liquors in prohibition districts. In other words, he wants to give force and effect to the local laws of particular communities in particular States governing the traffic in liquor. That is the object of the gentleman's bill—to enforce the State laws. Now, wouldn't it be better to pass another bill pending in this House which prohibits the internal-revenue department from issuing a license, or a tax receipt, in any community where the State authorities have either prohibition, or have the dispensary, or any other regulation in conflict with the license system? Would not that measure be better and more effective than yours?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I will say this: That I introduced a bill providing for that very thing in the early part of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and I soon discovered that it had no earthly chance of passing, and for this reason, that it was insisted by a number of gentlemen here, whose opinions I respected, that if you refused to issue a man a receipt for a tax which he offered to pay you could not then punish him for a failure to pay the tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. By special order the time is in the control of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have only forty minutes left on this side, but I will grant the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen will pardon me just one second, I am not seeking to get aid of the Federal Government in enforcing any State law whatever. I simply ask the Federal Government to get out of the way of the State and let the State enforce its own laws. [Applause.] The Secretary of the Treasury has issued an order, as I say, that is contrary to the rules of evidence that have always prevailed. Those rules have come down to us from the fathers. They have stood the test of time. The Secretary of the Treasury, in my opinion, ought not to be permitted to run counter to them unless there is an absolutely all-compelling necessity therefor.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is exactly my position. I am not opposed to the bill offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, but if the Department of Internal Revenue were forbidden to issue licenses or tax receipts in those localities where the State law forbids the licensing or the sale of liquor, would not that cure the whole evil? There would be no Federal license and no State license, and that would stop the traffic, and it would be the enforcement of the home rule in the particular communities.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, if the gentleman will allow me—because I have but a moment more—I say I introduced a bill along that line, and I wish it had become a law; but I soon found I had run up against a brick wall which I did not think I would ever get through, and I adopted this other method that I believe will accomplish the same thing, because if a man knows that the possession of a certificate is prima facie evidence of guilt, under the State law, and that when he pays his tax the State can get a copy of that certificate and present it to the next grand jury, if he has sense enough to run a blind tiger, he will have too much sense to pay the tax, and we will then have him between the devil and the deep blue sea. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am not making this as a prohibition speech. It is not a prohibition measure at all. I do not say that because I think it would lessen its merits if it were, understand me, but because I think that it might lessen its chances of success in this body. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Taft delivered an address before the graduating class at the Yale law school last summer upon the administration of the criminal laws in our country. It was a great speech, in every way worthy of the great man who delivered it, the great subject it treated, and the great occasion which prompted it. In this address he lamented the fact that the administration of the criminal law in the United States was a public scandal. He there made the startling announcement that in 1885 there were 1,808 homicides committed in the United States. Of that number, 108 were executed. In 1904 there were 8,482 homicides committed in the United States, and of that number only 116 were executed. No wonder the great Secretary exclaimed that the administration of the criminal law in this country was a disgrace to civilization. He laments the tendency of the courts to interpose technicalities between the defendant and his just punishment, and concludes with the direful prophecy that "nothing but a radical improvement in our administration of criminal law will prevent the growth in the number of lynchings in the United States, that bring the blush of shame to every lover of his country."

The President of the United States on his recent trip through the South spoke at a banquet given in his honor in Little Rock, Ark. In his remarks that night, following the good precedent set him by Governor Taft, he recalled the days of Jeffreys and the Bloody Assizes, when, under the Stuarts, it became necessary to throw around the citizen every possible technicality to guard him against the tyranny of the king, but he reminded his audience that our lot had fallen upon happier times; that the power of the king had now been supplanted by the power of the people; that then the law provided the death penalty in more than 200 cases of breach of the laws, but we had softened the rigor of these barbarous laws since sovereignty had been wrested from the king. I conclusion he said:

It is right to remember the interest of the individual, but it is right also to remember the interest of that great mass of individuals embodied in the public, in the Government. It is unfortunate that we have permitted practices that were necessary three hundred years ago for the protection of innocent people to be elaborated, to be perverted, so that they become a means for allowing criminals to escape the punishment of their criminality. We urgently need in this country methods for expediting punishment, methods for doing away with delay, methods which will secure to the public an even chance with the criminal. I do not ask any more. If we can get an average of just 50 per cent of the criminals, we will be pretty nearly all right, and we will give the public an even chance with the criminal whose offense is against the public.

These are two great speeches and both struck a popular chord, but if these gentlemen are dead in earnest about this matter, and nobody doubts that they are, if they really desire to strike down the technicalities which are being thrown between criminals and the law, and I am quite sure they do, they have it in their power to take a long stride in the right direction. They will have to make no pilgrimage to Arkansas, nor to the great site of learning in the East to find a subject "meet for repentance." If they wish to do a little real, genuine, effective missionary work along these lines, let them begin close at home. Let them take the gentleman who sits with them around the council table, the Secretary of the Treasury. Let them take him "separate and apart," as the law puts it, and have a heart-to-heart talk with him, and if they can not effect a treaty with him they may at least make a "temporary arrangement"—a sort of modus vivendi—and induce him to set aside this order, or at any rate modify it so that the State courts may have a "square deal" until Congress can act on the matter. Then the President may have his wish that the public have an even chance with the criminal.

Mr. Chairman, when Governor Taft made that speech last summer everybody in this country was shocked at the revelations he made. One thousand eight hundred and eight homicides in 1885; 8,482 in 1904! This, Mr. Chairman, is nothing short of appalling. I wish it were not true, but it is. I wish I could deny that it held true in my own State. I wish I could stand in my place here and deny that it is true of my own district, but I can not. The blood of more murdered men is crying out to-day against their brothers than ever before in our history. We all lament it, but we can not deny it.

'Tis true: 'tis true 'tis pity;
And pity 'tis 'tis true.

Mr. Chairman, the opinion prevails in Mississippi that the most fruitful source of murder there is the "blind tiger," especially among the negroes. A distinguished judge from that State was here a few days ago, and he told me he believed a majority of the homicides were due to illicit whisky sales. He gave that as his opinion after thirteen years as prosecuting attorney and four years as judge over a criminal court. Four other judges have written me since this bill was introduced, giving their estimates of homicides traceable to blind tigers, averaging, perhaps, 35 per cent. One very distinguished judge, who has made and is still making a most vigorous fight against these crime-breeding pests, says he believes they are the most fruitful source of homicides in his district, and he concludes his letter with this earnest sentence:

If there is any power in the State or National Government to suppress them [the blind tigers], it is nothing short of cruelty to the people of Mississippi, and especially to the negroes, to fail to exercise that power.

From the last report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue I find that the number of persons paying taxes to the Federal Government as retail liquor dealers is 557 in Mississippi, 640 in Maine, 3,024 in Kansas, 4,582 in Iowa, and 781 in North Dakota. The report only shows payments by States and not by counties, so that it is not possible to tell how many are paid in prohibition counties in States where local-option laws are in force. As stated, there are 557 persons in Mississippi who paid this tax last year, while only 123 were licensed to retail liquors under the laws of that State. In other words, 434 men in the State of Mississippi are engaged in an outlawed business, which is responsible, according to the judges of our criminal courts, for at least a third of the homicides committed there, and a Federal officer, who has in his office the proof which would land the last mother's son of them behind the bars, sets at naught the process of the courts and declines to testify, in his tender solicitude for their imaginary rights. The President thought it of sufficient importance to call for special mention in his message, that the Indians should be protected against "boot legging." Are the citizens of the several States who have outlawed the liquor business entitled to less consideration?

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard some very fine talk in this House recently about the people who refused to give evidence before the legislative committee in New York touching the scandals in the management of the great insurance companies. If we are really sincere in our condemnation of these recalcitrant witnesses let us pass this bill, and so prevent the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from setting them a bad example any longer. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to a proposition which is omitted entirely from the present bill in so far as it covers the paying for the transportation of silver dollars to the people and banks by the Government of the United States. We have had such a provision as to dollar pieces since 1881 or 1882. It was incorporated in one of the appropriation bills at that time, I dare say at the instance of Mr. Sherman, who was Secretary of the Treasury. I must be brief, because my time is limited. This expense has been paid out of the gain, or seigniorage, that has come into the Treasury of the United States by reason of the coinage of silver dollars. There has been no loss to the Government of the United States by reason of this expense. There has been a gain, a profit from the silver coinage, which we have used to pay this expense. If you will look at page 29 of the Mint report, which I have in my hand, for 1905, you will find there the amount of this profit.

SEIGNIORAGE ON SILVER COINAGE.

The balance of profits on the coinage of silver on hand in the mints June 30, 1904, was $64,716.64.

The total seigniorage on the coinage of silver during the fiscal year 1905 was $2,772,830.44, of which $93.07 was from the coinage of standard silver dollars, $2,771,652.88 from the coinage of subsidiary silver coins, $1,059.75 from the recoinage of Hawaiian silver coins, and $24.74 from the recoinage of Porto Rican silver coins into United States subsidiary coins.

Including the balance on hand at the mints July 1, 1878, the net seigniorage on silver coined from that date to June 30, 1905, aggregated $135,799,153.08.

The seigniorage on standard silver dollars under the act of July 14, 1890, from August 13, 1890 (the date the act went into effect), to June 30, 1905, was $52,834,843.05.

The amount of seigniorage deposited in the Treasury during the fiscal year was $2,837,402.91, leaving a balance on hand at the mints on June 30, 1905, of $144.17.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for a number of years, up to 1885, the expense of this transportation was paid directly out of this profit. In recent years, since 1890, say, all of this gain is paid into the Treasury of the United States, and Congress has made an "appropriation" direct to pay for this transportation.

There is no difference in paying into the Treasury this profit money and paying it out for this transportation and paying it out direct before it is turned into the Treasury.

This profit amounted up to June last to $135,799,153.08. This last year it was nearly $3,000,000.

Why do you need this transportation? It is simply because the banks and individuals throughout the United States who want the silver dollar per se and who do not want to use the paper dollar per se and not the silver certificate want the dollar piece sent to them, and they will not pay the freight or the expenses in so doing, so Mr. Secretary Sherman, seeing the wisdom of encouraging the use of the actual silver dollar as early as 1878, when the law was somewhat doubtful as to his power to do it, issued this order:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 3, 1878.

Paragraph 1. The Treasurer of the United States has been directed upon the receipt by him from any person of a certificate issued by any Assistant Treasurer, designated depositary, or national bank designated as a public depositary of the United States, stating that a deposit of currency has been made to his credit in general account of the sum of one thousand (1,000) dollars, or any multiple thereof not exceeding ten thousand (10,000) dollars, to cause a shipment to be made from some mint of the United States to the person in whose name the certificate is issued of a like amount of standard silver dollars, the expense of transportation to be paid by the mint.

Par. 2. Until further notice, upon receipt by the Treasurer of the United States of United States notes or national-bank notes sent for redemption, in multiples of $1,000 and not exceeding $10,000, standard silver dollars will be returned under the provisions of this circular.

Par. 3. The sole purpose of this circular is to facilitate the circulation of standard silver dollars for all purposes as currency, but not to authorize their issue for the purpose of being used directly in making those payments to the Government which are required to be made in coin or for deposit to obtain silver certificates, and officers receiving deposits of currency authorized herein are expected, so far as practicable, to see that the object specified is carried out.

Par. 4. Shipments as above indicated, however, will be made only to points in the United States reached through established express lines by continuous railway or steamboat communication.

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Now, I call the language in paragraph 3 to the attention of the committee; particularly do I call it to the gentlemen who live in the South and in the West, where silver money is mostly used in lieu of this rotten, microbe-eaten, disease-carrying paper money we must and do use, that we must get rid of at this Congress. The people down South, the laborers, the negroes, the cotton growers, the cotton buyers, and people out West, and farmers in particular, want the silver dollar and the Government, to encourage its actual circulation, to pay the freight to put and keep it in circulation. So Mr. Sherman said:

The sole purpose of this circular is to facilitate the circulation of standard silver dollars for all purposes as currency, etc.

Gold, they do not want or use, is small and easy to carry. The silver is heavy, they do want and use, and yet too heavy to carry, but both are coined by the Government.

Mr. Chairman, from away back in 1795 we have had a law wherein the Government has paid with this seigniorage and charged to the Mint, as proposed now, for the transmission of copper, for the transmission of the cent piece, for the transmission of the nickel piece and fractional coins, and then in 1857 we enacted a similar law covering Mexican and Spanish dollars which we utilized at that time. We paid for this transportation out of this profit money. Then in 1873, when we codified our coinage laws, we continued these laws.

I will here insert a letter from Mr. Roberts, Mint Director, on this subject. He says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
Washington, January 11, 1906.

Hon. L. N. LITTAUER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. LITTAUER: If I had known before going before you yesterday that the distribution of small coins was to be considered, I would have refreshed my memory upon some points. It has been some years since I have given the matter any attention, and my recollection was not very clear. To-day I have been looking over the statutes and refer you to the following record:

The first act providing for the distribution of copper coins is that of March 3, 1795, in which the Treasurer is directed to distribute them to the branches of the United States Bank, and in States where it has no branch to the "collector of the principal town in such State," same to be done at the risk and expense of the United States.

The revision of the coinage laws made in 1837 (January 18) provides that the copper coins may, at the discretion of the Director of the Mint, be delivered in "any of the principal cities and towns of the United States at the cost of the Mint for transportation," the cost to be defrayed from the proceeds of the coins. This is a sweeping provision.

The act of April 22, 1864, providing for the present cent piece, directs that they shall be paid out by the Mint and "such other depositaries as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate," expense to be met from the profits of the coinage. This is a more restricted authority.

The act of May 16, 1866, authorizing the 5-cent nickel, contains practically the same provision for distribution as that last referred to.

The codification of the coinage laws, known as the act of February 12, 1873, makes practically the same provision for the distribution of the minor coins as that made by the act of January 18, 1837, to wit, that they are to be delivered in any of the pricipal cities and towns of the United States at the cost of the Mint. This provision is in force to-day, and the cost of such deliveries from the Mint in the last fiscal year was $26,036.32. These coins have been delivered at the expense of the Mint ever since the act of 1873 went into effect.

I find, upon examination, that the provision in the sundry civil bill of 1898 to which Mr. Courts referred yesterday relates only to the distribution of minor coin from the Treasury and subtreasuries. Up to that time all shipments had been made from the Mint, and considerable embarrassment had been experienced by the Treasury from the fact that the subtreasuries were obliged to redeem these coins, but had no authority to ship them. The result was that coinage and shipments were going on at the Mint when the coins were really redundant and accumulating in the offices of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury accordingly asked for authority to make shipments from the latter. Since Mr. Courts has spoken of the opinion I gave at that time, I think I recall having been asked as to the wisdom of distributing these coins at the public expense, and I expressed the general opinion that it was advisable. It would appear from Mr. Courts's statement that the committee did not know that distribution was going on from the mints.

In the matter of subsidiary silver coins I find that I was not quite accurate in my statement of yesterday. The act of February 21, 1853, contains the first provision for the distribution of these coins, and it provides for their shipment only to "assistant treasurers, depositaries, and officers of the United States." Prior to the passage of this act the fractional silver coins were aliquot parts of the dollar and a full legal tender. They were now reduced in weight and made limited tender. This accounts for the change of policy in their distribution.

The act of 1873 contains precisely the same provision for distribution as that of 1853. The resumption act (January 14, 1875) provides for the issue of these coins "through the mints, the subtreasuries, public depositaries, and post-offices of the United States."

The sundry civil bill of March 17, 1881, contains the first general provision applying not only to subsidiary silver coins, but to dollars, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was instructed to transport them free of charge when requested to do so. You are familiar with these enactments since.

In this connection I may add that Secretary Sherman seems to have considered, as far back as 1878, that he had authority to deliver the dollars at the expense of the Treasury. I am inclosing herewith a copy of the circular issued by him.

I can see two reasons for the delivery of subsidiary silver and copper coins at the expense of the public, viz:

First. Congress has made these coins of limited tender. Beyond an amount required to meet current needs they are an unavailable asset to a bank. They are not good in the legal reserves required by law. There is therefore no danger that the banks will abuse the privilege of free shipment, as in the case of silver dollars, the latter being a full legal tender and good in the reserves are frequently shipped solely to suit the convenience of the banks, although the communities into which they are shipped may already have a surfeit of that denomination. The president of an important bank in Portland, Oreg., told me last month that it was the common practice of the smaller banks in the State of Oregon, when wanting money from San Francisco or the East, to have silver dollars shipped in at the Government expense, and that these coins accumulated in the banks of Portland beyond their storage facilities, compelling them to make shipment out at their own expense. There is a steady movement of dollars from the Treasury into the smaller towns of Oregon, and then out through the Portland banks back to the Treasury. The transportation of any form of full legal-tender money at the Government expense may be abused in this manner, because full legal-tender money is available for all purposes, while these small coins are available for only a specific purpose. If all legal-tender money were transported free, all shipments between subtreasury cities and between distant sections of the country would be made at the public expense. The congestion of funds at New York at certain seasons would be promoted and the disturbance caused by their withdrawal at other seasons enhanced.

The fact that small denominations are of limited tender and not good in the legal reserves will make the banks in any case naturally cautious about applying for them, but they will do so more freely if the shipments are without cost, and as there is a large profit on these coins, the Government is interested in promoting their circulation and recoups itself through the enlarged demand. It is only doing what an enterprising individual would do if he had a monopoly of the issue. The public is also more certain of generous accommodation in all parts of the country.

Second. It is not proposed to discontinue distribution from the mints to the ten offices of the Treasury. This distribution gives direct service to the business men of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New Orleans, St. Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, and San Francisco. The present system extends this particular service rendered by the subtreasuries to all the communities of the country and puts the latter on an equality with the former in this respect. If this service is discontinued, the pressure for additional subtreasuries will be increased.

I am inclosing a pamphlet copy of the coinage laws, and would refer you to pages 14, 36, 39, 46, 49, 56, 57, and 67.

Respectfully,

GEO. E. ROBERTS,
Director of the Mint.

Then when we attempted to increase the output of standard silver dollars, in the wisdom of Congress, a Democratic House, I believe, with a Republican Senate, inserted a provision to pay for this transportation out of funds in the Treasury, but this bill omits this provision as to silver dollars for the first time since 1881 or 1882, so that hereafter when an individual, or when a banker, or when a corporation, desires to get silver money to pay a debt, or send it to do so, he must pay the freight himself, which means that the silver money, instead of circulating as silver dollars per se to the amount of $66,000,000, will be piling up in the Treasury and their circulation hindered.

Treasurer Treat recommended this appropriation be dropped for all coins, but Mr. Secretary Shaw does not ask that this appropriation be dropped while every Congress since this law was started has continued it.

Without a single exception in the committee, I know for ten years, and in the House, we have been invariably contesting this matter, and yet the wisdom of it has been indorsed by the law being continued and yet now it is left out, and let me say here to you gentlemen that I want to economize. In your just reformations I want to help you. I voted against this southern subsidy steal we have been paying for twenty years for the Southern Railway and others that run to my home and south, and I will try to help you save money whenever you should justly. I would be willing to stop this expense now if I thought it was wise, but it is not. You know as well as that I am standing here that Mr. Secretary Shaw is now having trouble about not only the amount of money but the transmission of it around over the country. Every morning he wakes up, I dare say, and sends for the New York papers to see the condition of the market, yet by withdrawing this appropriation we tie up one of the means by which he is carrying on the prosperous condition, if you want to call it that, of our finances.

We are tying one of the main arteries that supplies finances to the South, where the great cotton market is situated, tying up the beef raisers and the beef packers and the western people and keeping them from getting the money that is best and cheapest for them to use and curtailing the best means of using silver coin. Now, I say that it is not fair to Mr. Secretary Shaw to go along and take a string, as it were, and tie one of the main arteries of finance in this country. It is not wise. It might cause a jar or panic in finance and curtail our money in circulation.

Aside from that, gentlemen, it is no loss to the Government. As I have shown here, we have gained, including the balance on hand at the mints July 1, 1878—that is, the seigniorage on silver—from that date to June, 1905, an aggregate of $135,799,153, that we have actually gained by coining silver money. The only thing I have ever heard of the United States engaging in where there is an actual showing of an actual gain is in the coinage of silver dollars. We paid for this expressage and paid for this transportation out of the seigniorage, or we can do so. I believe my distinguished friend, who has been honored by his people sending him back here to Congress and who used to be Speaker of this House, was in Congress when this first provision was started. It finally was put on in the Senate in a bill reported by Senator Beck, of Kentucky, and it has remained the law ever since.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you know as well as I that Mr. Speaker CANNON, one of the great financiers of this House and of the country, and who used to be a free-silver man, as I am now, has always continued this appropriation. He has never brought in a bill here to curtail this means of saying that the bankers and the great corporations of the country, the plain people of the country, the cotton growers of the country, the farmers of the West and elsewhere, shall have this heavy money shipped for them when they want to use it.

A bag of silver money, counted and stamped by the Government, can be used in the bag to pay debts as well as a single dollar handed over the counter, and the Government ships it around in a bag for that purpose, and thus aids the actual use and circulation of the dollar coinage and the small coins.

This also puts people away off from the Treasury and subtreasury on a parity with those near by, who can get money of all kinds when they want it.

If you say the express charges are extortionate, and I think they are, reduce them. If you say this is a "graft" for the transportation company, outlaw the graft and punish the offenders, but do not punish an unoffending people who want this money hauled for them in the regular course of their business. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my unused time. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CONNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 343. An act concerning a public building in Selma, Ala.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] yield some part of his time now? Mr. Chairman, if you please, how much time have we remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any part in the general debate on this appropriation bill, but I am inclined to do so, nevertheless, because of certain unfinished remarks that I myself made in the beginning of the debate on the Philippine tariff bill, and by reason of some very remarkable statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] yesterday upon the topic about which I have spent some labor and which I left in a somewhat unfinished condition.

I note in the official report of the gentleman's speech that he seems to place his opposition to the tariff on hides, which seems to me to be one of the smallest and most insignificant of all the complaints that have ever been made of the Dingley tariff bill, upon a ground that I think upon reflection neither the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] nor anybody else will stand. The gentleman's argument aims at this proposition, that if there was no tariff on hides there would be a greater profit to the manufacturer. Now, that alone is not a sufficient justification for this tariff and is not alone a sufficient justification for any man to favor a protective tariff upon raw material. That I may not be charged with misrepresenting the gentleman, I will read what he said:

It is perfectly apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the question of the tax upon hides is not a local question. Such an industry is entitled to consideration, and if the provisions of the tariff are not intended to protect manufacturing industries, upon what basis do such laws stand?

That he may not be able to say that he intended that it should mean manufacturing interests and everybody else, I will read from his colloquy with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY], in which he expressly places his opposition to the tariff on hides to the fact that the manufacturers could make 1 per cent or 2 per cent greater profit if the tariff was off of hides than he can make as it is now. But nowhere, so far as I am able to find, does he place his opposition upon the broad ground that the tariff on hides is not necessary for the promotion of the shoe industry and adds to the cost of the article, and thereby oppresses the consumer in the United States.

That is a defective support of the tariff principle that is injurious and harmful to every lover of the doctrine of which I profess to be a follower. And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY] expressly drove the matter home upon him and compelled him to admit that his objection was the objection that he could not manufacture shoes at quite as high a profit; and the same result came from the colloquy with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

Now, again, his argument was most unfair, in my judgment, possibly inadvertently so, when he speaks about the fact that there is no tariff, as he says, on sheepskins and calfskins, and that it is levied upon the heavy hides out of which and connected with which is manufactured the cheaper article of shoes. What is the difference, Mr. Chairman, between the sole leather used in the $6 shoe and the sole leather used in the $2 shoe? What is the difference? What shoe could be manufactured without the use of sole leather; and on that this hide tariff is levied. But again; how much of the heavy leather or leather manufactured out of the hides that are used in this country is leather that is used exclusively in the manufacture of shoes? Only a proportion of it; how large I am not able to say; but I do know that a very large proportion of this very heavy leather manufactured out of these heavy hides is used for all sorts of leather purposes not included in the manufacture of boots and shoes—belting of every description, and a vast number of commercial articles are manufactured out of the hides. Therefore the argument of the gentleman falls to the ground.

But, Mr. Chairman, I took this time rather for the purpose of very thoroughly illuminating the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the condition of the Massachusetts, and New England, and Ohio, and Chicago, and every other man engaged in the shoe and boot industry; and as an indication of what I will put into the RECORD I state that there is not an industry in the United States of America to-day that is prospering more generally than the boot and shoe industry. I will show that in every State in this country where there is any considerable manufacture of the article the owners of the manufacturing industries have prospered, and in this year of our Lord 1906 they are boasting throughout every State of New England and the West and the Middle States of the growth of their industry and the tremendous prosperity that has come to them. I was astonished and amazed. A gentleman sent this to me from Boston on yesterday, calling my attention to four or five pages that summarized from all these places the results of the growth and prosperity of this industry. Now, Mr. Chairman, without occupying any further time, I ask unanimous consent that along the particular line which I have chosen I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I print here certain reports from various shoe-manufacturing towns and cities published in the Boot and Shoe Reporter, a pamphlet published in Boston. These extracts come from the issue of January 10, instant:

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FIVE AS A BUSINESS YEAR—VOLUME OF TRADE IN LEADING CENTERS—PROSPECTS AND CONDITIONS FOR 1906.

INTRODUCTION.

The year 1905 will go on record as one of exceptional prosperity for the shoe and leather industries, as far, at least, as the volume of business is concerned. The canvass of the leading shoe-manufacturing centers proves beyond doubt that the demand has grown much faster than the normal rate of increase for the population, which is proof that there has been a marked improvement in the general business and industrial conditions, giving a larger value of production in all lines of industry, which adds to the general wealth, while the earnings of the workers in turn give a larger consuming power and a larger demand for all the products.

It is a peculiarity of the shoe and leather industries that the production of their raw material in hides and skins can not be increased or diminished to meet the changes in the demand, as is the case with the materials for other industries. Hence when the exceptional demand comes for the finished products there is necessarily the corresponding scarcity of the hides and skins, which as surely result in the higher prices. Then, as it is more difficult to advance the prices of the finished products, there is for the time being an unsatisfactory condition for profits in manufacturing.

The basis of all business, however, is the demand for the products, and if demand is lacking, it is of small import as to whether the cost of the materials is higher or lower. Given the demand, prices must eventually regulate themselves to afford a fair margin for the work of production, and the higher cost of the materials must be a minor consideration.

The reports given herewith all show the increased demand with the increased volume of production. The records of the shoe shipments from Boston show 5,100,038 cases for 1905, against 4,730,332 cases for 1904 and 4,258,207 cases for 1900. This is an increase of nearly 8 per cent for the five years, while the normal increase in the population is less than 25 per cent for the year. This indicates something of the increased demand due to the better conditions with the mass of the people, and proves that prosperity is not a question of low prices.

The progress as shown by the reports herewith is certainly gratifying. The increase fairly corresponds with the developments of other industries, and shows that the shoe and leather men are getting a share of the general prosperity, which will make the old year memorable.

LYNN—FORTY MILLIONS' WORTH OF FOOTWEAR—THAT IS THE ESTIMATED BUSINESS FOR LYNN FOR 1905.

The figures presented herewith are estimates of the Lynn shoe production for 1905. The board of trade has prepared no statistics, the Manufacturers' Association has not yet compiled its reports, and the estimate of the shoe product is obtained by reckoning a 10 per cent increase as to the number of shoes made in 1905 over 1904, the 1904 production being 21,511,092 pairs. The average value per pair is estimated by increasing the value per pair by 10 per cent. The board of trade having fixed $1.50 per pair as the average per pair in 1904, a 10 per cent increase over that makes an average value of $1.65 per pair for 1905. These estimates are very conservative when the increased business done the past year is considered. Here are the figures: $40,000,000, value of shoe and boot product; $10,000,000, value of cut stock product; $6,000,000, value of upper leather product; $1,000,000, value of boot and shoe findings product; $13,000,000, value of machinery, lasts and patterns, cartons, shoe forms, and other supplies made by Lynn firms; 23,662,201, estimated total number of pairs of shoes made; $1.65, estimated total average value per pair; $39,042,631.65, value of total product on above estimates.

Some manufacturers think the increase in volume greater than 10 per cent, but a 10 per cent increase figures close to the increase in shipments from the Boston market, 8 per cent.

Other manufacturers think that $1.65 is a low average value. This average value must be largely a guess. Lynn makes everything from cheap infants' shoes to the finest women's goods, and such special foot wear as storm boots at $15 per pair.

BROCKTON—GREAT BUSINESS IN 1905—NEARLY 700,000 CASES MADE, REPRESENTING 15,000,000 PAIRS, VALUED AT $38,000,000.

The record of Brockton's shoe shipments for the year 1905 is one which surpasses any previous year in the city's history. The shipments of 692,138 cases, representing 14,228,000 pairs, valued at $38,070,000, makes a new record in the shoe-factory production of the city. The production of this great number of shoes, figured on the basis of 300 working days in the year, means the turning out of 47,246 pairs a day, 5,526 pairs an hour, 87 pairs a minute, or about a pair and a third every second, all completed and ready for shipment.

This remarkable showing is one which is highly creditable to Brockton shoe manufacturers. It emphasizes the position which Brockton occupies as a leading center for the production of men's fine shoes, and brings to the notice of the shoe world in an unmistakable manner the preeminence of Brockton shoes.

The average value per pair of the goods made in this city during the past year is $2.50—a higher average than has ever before been reached in Brockton foot wear. Year by year this average has been steadily mounting upward, until now it touches high-water mark. From this time forward Brockton will be known as the center for the production of fine shoes and a city which sets the styles in this class of foot wear for the entire country.

As the past year has been one of universal prosperity, the outlook for the coming year is equally satisfactory. In the face of the closest competition and paying the highest prices for labor, Brockton continues to grow and prosper, and to give to all who are connected with this industry, as well as to the city in general, a development which is one of the most remarkable of any city in the United States. The demand for fine shoes is constantly increasing; and Brockton's product is steadily growing along these lines. Retailers and consumers can depend upon obtaining from this city shoe goods which represent the acme of style, as well as the most excellent workmanship. All the factories in Brockton are busily employed for the spring season; and there is every reason to look forward to an output for 1906 which will show an important increase over that of 1905.

HAVERHILL—LARGEST IN ITS HISTORY—$20,000,000 BUSINESS FOR 1905—GOOD PROSPECTS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

The largest year's business in the shoe industry of the city was that which was transacted for 1905. The number of cases shipped from Haverhill during the past twelve months was 418,418, an increase of 8,443 cases over 1904—which latter was also a record-breaking year. In these cases were 16,736,720 pairs, representing a money value of $20,000,000.

The foregoing figures are reliable, furnishing as they do from official sources, and representing without any padding, the output of Haverhill's shoe factories during 1905. That this output exceeded all previous records in the city's history is a matter of gratification to the members of the local trade, as well as to the city in general. Haverhill was never so prosperous as at the present time. All available skilled help is employed on full time and at good wages; and the factories almost without exception have sufficient orders to keep them busy for many weeks to come.

The outlook, therefore, for the coming year is a rosy one. With added factory accommodations, which are needed at this time and which it is hoped will soon be forthcoming, Haverhill manufacturers will be in shape to serve their trade to better advantage than ever before, and to give them a quantity, as well as a quality, of foot wear which will represent the best efforts of experienced shoe manufacturers and the best workmanship in all departments which can be obtained in any shoe center of the United States.

Haverhill, which has long been celebrated for the production of women's shoes, is not only increasing in the production of this class of work, but is now turning out a great amount of men's foot wear. This is an important addition to the output of the factories and one which is bringing many customers from the wholesale and retail trade in all parts of the United States. From all present indications the coming year will see the largest business transacted in Haverhill's history, and put into the shade even the great business which has been done during 1905.

NEW YORK—HEAVY BUSINESS FOR 1905—PROSPECTS FOR COMING SEASON COULD NOT BE BRIGHTER.

Two facts stand out prominently in a survey of the shoe and leather industry for the year just ended. One is that the raw materials entering into the shoes has ruled at unprecedentedly high figures. The other is that from the manufacturer to the consumer all have been able to secure fair values. A retrospect discloses a healthy condition in all sections of the manufacturing, jobbing, and retail districts of the greater city. It is a great satisfaction that during the past year, although many difficult circumstances had to be met, all interested in this industry have survived and prospered.

The one feature of the shoe business which stands out more prominently than any other is the increased demand for goods of the better grades. This tendency was noticed in 1904, but the year 1905 witnessed a much more emphatic demand for higher grade foot wear. The manufacturers and jobbers here state, as do also the retailers, that the demand for the best goods that could be produced has been general throughout the country. The reason for this may be found, they claim, in the fact that nearly every section has been blessed with prosperity, labor has been fully employed, and all coarse grains have commanded higher prices than other years.

In no line of manufacture does New York's leadership show itself more strikingly than in the production of high-class foot wear. Some of the leading makers of fine foot wear of the country are located here, and the hold that New York shoe manufacturers have gained upon the retail shoe merchants of the country and all over the country is one of the most interesting facts connected with New York shoe manufacturing. New York shoe manufacturers are recognized as style creators; the extent of their operations enables them to present styles and shapes sometimes as much as a whole season ahead of manufacturers in other localities. In matters of style and designs is seems to be generally acknowledged that New York shoe manufacturers are far in the lead of manufacturers in other cities.

For two years past shoe jobbers and manufacturers, as a rule, enjoyed a trade large in volume, and showing a heavy increase over the traffic of several preceding years, but, in the majority of instances, business has been transacted on a somewhat small margin of profit, not admitting of gains which may be fairly considered legitimate and reasonable. This has been more especially and markedly the case during the last six months. The general policy, particularly with the jobbers, has been to maintain and increase the volume of business, though this necessitated selling on an only slightly remunerative, and even in some instances practically unremunerative, basis.

While this course has been, to some extent, the result of voluntary and deliberate choice, still dealers in general claim no especial credit for it, and admit that in pursuing it they made a virtue of necessity, it being a question of doing business in this manner or of not doing it at all. Increased sales, however, have compensated in a large measure for the smaller margin of profit attached to individual sales. This year has been an exceptional one for heavy trade. When one considers that the aggregate volume of traffic for 1904 was fully 20 per cent larger than that for 1903, and that 1905 showed an increase over 1904 of probably about 25 per cent, which is, according to the estimate of one of the most conservative jobbers on Duane street, the business for the year seems little less than phenomenal.

A good beginning is not everything, for a year that was to be so remarkable opened with a dull month. Immediate business was in a very dormant condition, and sales of spring foot wear only fair, though larger than in January, 1904. The increase in the volume of spring orders held out through the first two months of the year, and the aggregate of sales for January and February was considerably increased over the preceding year, but profits showed a decrease, if anything. The long continuance of severe winter weather and late opening of spring were unfavorable for spring business during April and May and reduced the number of sales. Fall orders of a very gratifying nature, however, began to appear early, for while buyers were at first conservative and showed little tendency to stock heavily, even in the face of probable advances, they soon changed their views to considerable extent, and a more or less general desire to purchase before advances should be made without doubt exerted a strong influence in increasing the number and size of early fall orders.

By the middle of June orders booked for fall were of sufficient volume to warrant local manufacturers in increasing their facilities for production, and distinctly augured that uninterrupted activity which has since prevailed at the factories, amounting at times to positive pressure. From the close of the midsummer between-seasons periods until about the 1st of November unusual activity prevailed, but since then the mild, dry, unseasonable weather has exerted an unfavorable effect upon immediate business, which, perhaps, with rain, snow, and cold seasonable weather, would have fallen somewhat below the mark on account of the more than unusually heavy early buying.

The remarkably unseasonable weather has had a detrimental and even serious effect on the business of the jobber and retailers. The latter have stocked up with winter shoes and rubbers, for which they have little or no call as yet. Last year millions of pairs were sold before this, but the lost trade of the past seven weeks can not be fully made up however severe the coming winter may prove to be. There are no specially new features in the styles of shoes. All manufacturers have, as by common consent, adopted practical styles and shape lasts, which jobbers and retailers have appreciated, as it must eventually save them from serious loss.

Another excellent feature of the past year has been the fact that collections were never better. Buyers have been only too anxious to take up their bills and secure every advantage that was to be obtained by prompt payments of same. This indicates more than anything else the healthy trade conditions existing throughout the country, and is one of the strongest arguments in favor of a large business to come during at least the early part of 1906.

ROCHESTER—OUTPUT IN 1905—A LARGE INCREASE IS NOTED AND 1906 PROSPECTS THE BEST.

By careful inquiry among the manufacturers of shoes in Rochester, most of whom stated their gross output of shoes for the year, the others estimated, I find that the total value is upward of $10,000,000. This includes infants' shoes, the production of which is 90 per cent of all made in this country, and amounts close to half a million dollars a year. There are three or four soft-sole makers whose product is over a hundred thousand dollars each, and there are more than twenty soft-sole makers.

The new factories in course of erection, additions to others, and increased mechanical facilities in many indicate that the output for 1906 should, with fairly good general business conditions, exceed the year by 20 to 30 per cent. The only difficulty in realizing such an increase will be that of labor. Help is scarce now, but the manufacturers say that the improvements in machinery will help them materially and that they will be able to make quite an increase in their output with the natural increase of operatives due to the fast growing population of the city.

PHILADELPHIA—A RÉSUMÉ—THE SHOE BUSINESS AND ITS ALLIED LINES IN PHILADELPHIA FOR 1905, WITH THE GENERAL EXPECTATION FOR THE COMING YEAR.

For the year 1905 in the shoe and leather business of Philadelphia and vicinity the showing is most decidedly one of progress. There have been some lines in which this progress has not been so marked as in others, but it would be difficult to find a single one in which there has been anything like retrogression.

That the amount of business done in glazed kid, for which the city of Philadelphia is the market center of the United States, was not during the year as heavy as it might have been, is of course known and admitted, but this has been due to a great extent to the unprecedented popularity of the shiny stocks, such as patent colt, chrome tanned patent sole leather, and the like. Of course there was also a great demand for patent kid, but this assisted rather than hurt the activity of the glazed kid manufacturers.

In shoe manufacturing the past year has shown steady advances as far as the Philadelphia trade is concerned. All of the factories have made better showings than the 1904 figures for both the spring and fall seasons. This advance may be 10 per cent or as high as 35 per cent. It varies in different instances, which for obvious reasons may not be given more specifically, but in all of them there is the same story of better business for this year than for the year that went before. Several of the manufacturers within the past year found it necessary to increase the size of their plants or move into buildings that would better accommodate their business, since in these instances the demand for their shoes had proved greater than the then capacity of the plants to get the goods out.

Yet, withal, it is questionable whether there was an advance in profits equal to the increase in business. That the manufacturers made money goes without saying, but it is quite likely that in many of the instances the advance in the cost of raw material and a slower response in the advance of the finished product cut the profits on some of the lines turned out, so that although there have been no losses, yet the percentage of money gain is not equal for the year to the percentage of business gain.

What is true of the manufacturing business is equally true of the wholesale trade in Philadelphia. There have been advances of considerable size throughout the entire trade. Of course these have been greater with the larger houses, not only actually but in proportion. The larger houses have been in a position to buy heavier in the face of advances and have been in better position to present their goods to their customers. In consequence, the largest percentage of increase, as well as the largest volume of business shown for the past year, has for the most part been with the more important houses.

The outlook for the spring trade, from the point of view of the Philadelphia wholesale merchant, based upon the spring orders that are on hand, is excellent. These orders show a great increase in early business over that of last year. There is a possibility that some of this is speculative on the part of the retail buyer, who fears still further advances in the cost of shoes, and if this is so there may be a slump in sales later on, but this is only a conjecture for which there can not in the nature of things at the present time be either affirmation or denial. As the matter stands, the public generally is very optimistic, holding that with the general prosperity of the country, lots of work, and good wages, there is bound to be an increased demand for shoes, as for all other styles, and makers are framing up their business in accordance with this view.

BALTIMORE, MD.—THE YEAR'S BUSINESS—1905 A YEAR OF DEVELOPMENT IN ALL BRANCHES OF THE SHOE TRADE, WHICH IS NOW GREATER THAN BEFORE THE FIRE.

At this time a review of business conditions of a given section for the year just past is always interesting, inasmuch as it demonstrates the progress made in the industry discussed during the period named. So an outline of the development of the shoe trade in Baltimore during 1905 would be apropos at the present time.

In manufacturing circles the situation has been one of continuous expansion. Some of the factories since the fire have so outgrown their present quarters that it has been necessary to take larger quarters in new buildings erected since the catastrophe, while others, by rearrangement of present plants, have been able to meet the growing demand of their business without more radical changes.

But in all of the manufacturing establishments there have been advances in the volume of business during the past year, none showing less than 10 per cent and most of them more than that, when the volume of business is being considered. Owing to unsettled market conditions, the advancing cost of materials without as quick a response in the finished product, there may have been a somewhat smaller percentage of profit during the latter half of the year, but with conditions readjusted as they are for the spring trade this will be overcome.

Of the spring outlook it may be said that there is every prospect of a good showing in all respects. There have already been a great many spring orders taken, a showing that is greater than for the corresponding period of last year by a generous margin, and from the reports of the salesmen, all of whom are on the road, it is likely that this state of affairs will be continued.

The wholesale shoe trade, like that of the shoe manufacturer of Baltimore, has closed up a year of development and progress that in all ways has been most satisfactory. The great Baltimore fire without doubt affected all lines of industry, and since that time the trade has been recovering not slowly, but by leaps and bounds. It is safe to say that 1905 saw the last effect of the fire, as far as the shoe trade is concerned, overcome, and the people in the wholesale houses are looking forward to the coming year as one in which they will make a showing that is better than anything that they have ever done, not alone since the fire, but in their past histories.

Many of the houses have increased their selling force, covering a wider range of territory and covering it with greater thoroughness, and the trade of the city has been enriched by the establishment of permanent selling agencies from eastern and other factories, some of which carry stock on the floor.

All of this tends to make Baltimore more than ever a shoe center—that is, particularly the logical one for the nearer South and the immediate West—and the houses of the city are shaping their policy with a view to develop this territory, most desirable in all respects and available constantly.

CHICAGO—GREAT TRADE GROWTH—VALUE OF SHOES AND LEATHER MANUFACTURED DURING YEAR ENDING 1905.

Chicago presents the following statistics as a record of the past year's growth, as compared with the previous year of 1904:

Values of manufactures.

	1905.	1904.
Hides	$49,280,000	$36,000,000
Tanneries	13,500,000	11,250,000
Boots and shoes	28,000,000	25,000,000

Values of wholesale trade.

	1905.	1904.
Boots and shoes	$114,400,000	$101,700,000
Leather and findings	10,492,000	9,400,000

Manufacturers and wholesalers report to the writer that they are more than pleased with the results for 1905, and the prospects for 1906 are most flattering, indeed; that there is a general belief there will be an increased manufacture of both shoes and leather, and a much larger increase in the selling of boots and shoes at wholesale. The prospects are most encouraging for the new year.

ST. LOUIS—1905 SHOWS INCREASE—WIDESPREAD PROSPERITY AND LARGE, OPEN STOCKS HELP IN BREAKING OF RECORDS.

Referring to the large increase in the volume of business transacted in the local market during the past year, the managers of the houses on Washington avenue aver that business has increased each month and that each month's record has broken the best records for any given month of the previous year. The causes of the great avalanche of orders which have come to the local manufacturing market during the past year can be traced to the widespread and phenomenal prosperity of the great West and Middle West, and to the large, open stocks always kept on the floor by the manufacturers.

Some of the manufacturers have recorded increases as large as 33⅓ per cent, while others have increased their business fully 35 per cent. Present orders for spring are being filled on an increased basis per pair, and this will result in many retailers selling shoes to the consumer at an advance ranging from 20 cents to 30 cents per pair. Business is being done almost a month in advance of previous years. This advancement of the selling season is traced to the advances in leather, as well as to the fear of further advances in the near future.

Many of the representatives of the houses assert that their firms have made greater gains in the Eastern States than they have in the western territory. The opinion is prevalent that the coming year will see a great enlargement in the territory of the local market, and that the prosperity of 1905 will be duplicated twofold in 1906. Unseasonable weather conditions did much to restrict business during the past year.

Leather has advanced from 25 per cent to 40 per cent over the prices of a year ago. There has been a steady rise in prices, with no setback throughout the year. Hides are now selling at the highest price since 1872. Manufacturers are now down to hardpan, and must have supplies to meet the demand for orders already booked. The volume of leather consumed exceeds that of any previous year, and conservative estimates place the increase at something over 19 per cent.

CINCINNATI—A GREAT YEAR WAS 1905—OVER 13,000,000 PAIRS OF SHOES MADE.

Of the various industries of the Queen City none have made greater strides during the past year than the shoe and leather industry. Interviews with Cincinnati's twenty-three shoe manufacturers and a careful comparison of the data furnished shows that even with a conservative estimate the increase in the volume of her product over that of 1904 is from 20 to 25 per cent.

In round numbers, the Cincinnati shoe manufacturers have produced for the year 1905 approximately 13,380,000 pairs of men's, women's, infants', and children's shoes. The value of the output of the local factories for 1905 is estimated at $23,415,000. The daily output is estimated at about 41,600 pairs.

The shoe manufacturers of the Queen City, without an exception, state that the outlook for next season's business is highly encouraging, and that even in the face of higher prices they expect their business for next fall to show heavy gains over that for spring delivery. Every one of the factories in Cincinnati is running to its full capacity. A number of the concerns have already moved into larger quarters, and those occupying old plants are arranging to occupy new buildings before the close of the year 1906—all of which is a glowing tribute to the high popularity of the Cincinnati-made shoe.

The majority of the dealers in leather as well as the manufacturers report an increase of about 15 per cent in the output over the year 1904. For the year 1904 the sales for Cincinnati are approximated at $10,000,000. With this as a basis and the percentage of increase as reported by the various concerns, the output for the year 1905 would be approximately $11,000,000, Cincinnati being ranked as the largest leather market west of New York. The local tanners of leather state that the output of leather has been curtailed to some extent by the great scarcity of hides, and that the prospect for the ensuing year would be much better for the manufacturers of leather if they were able to secure sufficient raw material. Still, the enormous business done the past season by the shoe manufacturers on orders for spring delivery has made the outlook brighter than it has been for years.

MILWAUKEE—A PROSPEROUS YEAR—INCREASES RECORDED IN EVERY LINE—MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALERS JUBILANT.

Milwaukee shoe manufacturers and wholesalers have prospered during the year 1905. The tanners, leather, rubber, and findings men have also done a largely increased business. Following is a table indicative of some of the good things accomplished:

Lines.	Establishments.	Employees.	Wages paid.	1905 product.
Leather	13	3,800	$926,789	$20,000,000

Manufacturers and wholesalers predict a big showing for the coming year. In spite of the hindrances in the shape of prices and unseasonable weather, local men in the shoe district predict that the coming year will bring a trade boom to this market. The soundness of the money market and all that pertains to the financial welfare of the territory tributary to Milwaukee form the keynote of statements by the leading shoe and leather men.

In a general way the territory tributary to this market has enjoyed a larger measure of prosperity than in any former year. There have been few failures in business, and consequently the losses to the banks have been nil. Collections were never better. Country consumers are in better financial condition that at any time in the history of Milwaukee's leading business men. Retailers are not overstocked, and are buying liberally for future delivery.

The manufacturers of boots and shoes have been up against the strong advances in hides and the natural advance in leather which has followed. The result of it all is a cost of about 25 per cent more for the local manufacturer of boots and shoes. The difference in price is readily understood when it is known that the hides which cost 9 cents a pound in most cases have advanced to 16 cents. The trade during the busy months of the year found stocks of heavy shoes almost entirely sold out, and big orders coming from the Western States had to be partially filled from odd lots or turned down. The whole country seems to be engaged in a race to lay in stocks of footwear, and the Milwaukee volume of trade is increasing right along.

Do these reports show that it is necessary or important to disturb the peace of the country and arrest this flood of great prosperity while we enter the domain of revision?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there has been a considerable amount of criticism against the attempt of the southern cotton producers to reduce the cotton acreage and diversify crops. This criticism has been along the line that it would result in a large increase in the growth of cotton in the colonies of Great Britain, France, and Germany, and I wish to read now an article from the Crop Reporter of January, 1906. The Crop Reporter is a publication of the Bureau of Statistics, under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, and therefore official. It shows the result of the efforts of these several countries to increase the growth of cotton, from which it certainly appears that the southern cotton grower has nothing to fear in the direction of these efforts. Therefore I will not take up the time of the House, but ask that the article be printed as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

COLONIAL COTTON.

From original and official sources of information it is possible to compile a statement of the production of commercial cotton in the colonies of European countries, and the bare statement of the facts indicates how little there is to be expected from "colonial cotton" in new areas as a competitor of the upland cotton of the United States for many years to come. Old cotton areas, such as the British East Indies, French Indo-China, and the Dutch East Indies, are out of the problem, although these regions are included in the accompanying tabular statements.

BRITISH COLONIES.

Excluding the British East Indies, the production or exports of cotton for all British colonies, dependencies, and protectorates (not including Egypt) amounted in 1904 to 7,670 bales of lint of 500 pounds gross weight. This is mostly commercial cotton, and nearly half of it came from western Africa, in the Nigeria region. The West Indies and British Guiana contributed 1,626 bales, and Cyprus and Malta, in the Mediterranean Sea, contributed 1,463 bales; from eastern Africa were exported 609 bales; from central Africa and Uganda, 642 bales; from southern Africa, 3 bales, and from Australasia, 18 bales.

The British colonial cotton crop of 1904, mostly commercial, excluding British East Indies, was three times the crop of 1903. If the entire increase in all British colonies, except the East Indies, is to be accredited to efforts of the British cotton manufacturers to become independent of the upland cotton of the United States, which is not to be assumed fully, the sum of the results of their efforts for one year (1904) amounts to 5,073 bales, and less than half of this cotton is at all like the upland cotton of this country.

COLONIES OF FRANCE.

A statement for four years has been prepared for the cotton producing and exporting colonies of France. From the total of these it is proper to exclude French Indo-China, which is not at all implicated in the problem of producing cotton in new colonial regions and had a commercial crop of 13,679 500-pound bales in 1903.

Most of the colonial-grown cotton of France, outside of Indo-China, is exported after ginning. The latest information obtainable is for 1903, during which year as many as 76 bales of 500 pounds gross weight were exported from French colonies, and nearly all of this was exported from Tahiti. Mayotte exported a little over 1 bale and Senegal a little over 2 bales. Madagascar has hardly more than half a bale to its credit, and Guadeloupe less than 1 bale.

EFFORTS IN GERMAN COLONIES.

According to the prospectuses of the German Association of Manufacturers to promote cotton growing in the colonies, which have been widely published as accomplished facts, the quantity of colonial-grown cotton for commercial purposes might be expected to exceed by far the actually reported quantities.

The statements with regard to the German experiments in regions in western Africa are often extremely conflicting, although emanating from professedly trustworthy sources. The official statements are that in 1904 German East Africa exported 868 bales of 500 pounds gross weight; Togo, 499 bales; or, these two colonies together, 1,367 bales. To this may be added the German colony New Guinea, from which (Bismarck Archipelago) 240 bales were exported in 1903. Thus the cotton exports of German colonies amount to 1,607 bales of lint reduced to the equivalent of 500 pounds gross weight.

German experiments have been made in Kamerun and in German Southwest Africa, but their success in any degree is still in doubt.

A few cotton-growing experiments have been made in the Italian East Africa colony of Somali, but no definite results. The Italian colony of Eritrea exported about eight 500-pound bales in 1904.

LESS THAN 10,000 BALES.

In the United Kingdom, Germany, and France there are associations of cotton manufacturers for the purpose of promoting the production of cotton in new regions in the colonies of these countries, and the total evidence of their accomplishment in 1904 for the United Kingdom, Germany, and Italy, and in 1903 for France, is as follows:

	Bales of 500 pounds (gross weight).
United Kingdom	7,670
France	76
Germany	1,607
Italy	8
Total	9,361

The above total would be far from making conspicuous a cotton-growing county in Georgia.

The average value per pound of the colonial-exported cotton at the ports of export is 6.09 cents for France, 6.62 cents for Germany, and 5.26 cents for Italy.

OTHER COUNTRIES.

No cotton is produced in the West Indian possessions of the Netherlands and of Denmark, nor in Spanish Africa nor, as far as appears, is any commercial cotton produced in the Portuguese colonial possessions.

The Dutch East Indies have produced cotton from time immemorial, and, although they are not to be reckoned with the colonial efforts of the United Kingdom, Germany, France, and Italy within the last few years, their cotton production for export is given in the accompanying table. The commercial cotton of the Dutch East Indies is exported mostly to Singapore, Hongkong, and Japan, and its amount in 1903 was 12,632 bales of 500 pounds gross weight.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have no other request for time on this side of the House, and I yield back the twenty minutes I have for the purpose of closing the debate. But before that is done, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill on the other side—can not we have an hour when we come to the Panama Canal item?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is understood that there is to be general debate when that provision is reached.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Very well, Mr. Chairman; with this understanding I yield back my twenty minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in the preparation of the bill now under consideration the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having jurisdiction of deficiency appropriations gave the utmost consideration to all of the items submitted by the Departments to Congress for deficiency or emergency appropriations. We spent eight or nine days in the consideration of these estimates and in the preparation of this bill. There was perhaps greater necessity for scrutiny in respect to these estimates than heretofore. The law enacted by the Fifty-eighth Congress is applicable to all general and miscellaneous appropriations, and therefore, to explain to the House what we knew and expected the House would want explained fully, we believed it was our duty to the House to obtain all the information possible on the subject of deficiencies for the current fiscal year.

It was stated yesterday that in the matter of public expenditures there has been some evasion of the law by some Departments of the Government. I made that statement myself in answer to a gentleman on the other side, and other gentlemen also made the statement. I think the facts justify the statement, and even justify a stronger statement than that which was made.

The deficiency estimates submitted to us (and I am now speaking of deficiencies that come under the provisions of the law enacted by the last Congress) aggregated $6,067,763.07. The deficiencies in annual and miscellaneous appropriations carried in this bill aggregate only $3,476,042.30, or, in other words, the amount of deficiencies allowed by the committee is $2,591,721.77 less than the estimates we were asked to appropriate for as deficiencies.

Our first inquiry was whether or not this law, which was intended to prevent what a Cabinet officer before the subcommittee very aptly described as "the policy of coercive appropriations," had been complied with or not. This inquiry was necessary to determine whether the estimated deficiencies were legal or illegal. Some question has arisen in this debate on several of these deficiency items with special reference to that question. I will take up an estimate submitted to us by the Secretary of the Navy, which illustrates how this law can be evaded and emphasizes the necessity for an amendment to the law.

The Secretary of the Navy transmits to the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with law, an estimated deficiency of $1,000,000 in the appropriation made by the last Congress for maintenance and repairs of machinery. Now, that estimated deficiency is attempted to be justified by the Secretary of the Navy in this way: The Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering submitted to the Secretary, in a letter dated November 20, 1905, four months after the beginning of this fiscal year, the following:

Your attention is respectfully invited to the provisions of section 3679 of the Statutes at Large, prohibiting the expenditure of money by any department of the Government in excess of the amount appropriated, and to a consideration of the fact that the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam Engineering for the current fiscal year is not enough—is not enough to keep the machinery of our ships in that good condition which should be characteristic of all war ships.

On that the Secretary of the Navy waived the apportionment of this appropriation, which apportionment was made before the beginning of this fiscal year, or less than four months previous. That waiver was made under date of November 27. The apportionment was made June 30, or shortly prior to June 30, 1905. On November 27 the then head of the Bureau informed the Secretary of the Navy that the appropriation was not sufficient to meet the demands of the service in his Bureau, and the Secretary of the Navy upon that representation waived the apportionment, allowing the head of the Bureau to expend the entire appropriation, if necessary, in the next two months, irrespective of the apportionment that was made at the beginning of the fiscal year and irrespective of the appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. GRAFF. Is there anything disclosed in the hearings to justify the belief that there was any sudden emergency or contingency upon which that waiver could be reasonably said to be based?

Mr. TAWNEY. Nothing whatever was disclosed in the hearings that would indicate an extraordinary emergency or even an unusual circumstance. The fact is the last Congress appropriated an amount slightly less than the Department estimated would be necessary for this service, but the apportionment was made in compliance with the law, and in less than four months after the apportionment was made it was waived, in accordance with the letter of the law, and the expenditure of that appropriation is now being made, and has since that time been made, just as though this law was not on the statute books.

Mr. RIXEY. I suppose the chairman of the committee is referring to the Bureau of Equipment?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am referring to the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam Engineering.

Mr. RIXEY. For coal?

Mr. TAWNEY. For maintenance and repairs of machinery.

Mr. RIXEY. I suppose the same argument applies to the question of coal and the maintenance of coal depots, of which I have just been making some investigation. In regard to that Bureau, the appropriation last year was $2,750,000. The Department is now asking a few hundred thousand dollars, $500,000, I believe, additional for 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. One million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is what they are asking for.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, as there is about one-half of this fiscal year remaining, would it not be better for Congress, if it means to enforce the law which it passed, to strike out that provision for the deficiency and let the Bureau of Equipment, or whatever Bureau has charge of that, go on and apportion its fund for the balance of the year?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a matter that will be considered when that item is reached under the five-minute rule. The reasons for allowing the amount will be fully explained. We had the admiral in charge of that Bureau before us, and his testimony in respect to the necessity for the million-dollar appropriation was made.

Mr. RIXEY. I will state that the same bureau chief has been before another committee, and he has explained why this deficiency occurred. It is in the extra cost of transportation of coal in American bottoms. But it seems to me from what I could gather that this Bureau has been laying up an unusual supply of coal, and if that policy were changed to some extent, it might get along with the appropriation which it has for 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, this estimated deficiency of $1,000,000 for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, or for the maintenance and repairs of machinery, was not allowed by the committee because the evidence clearly showed that if this appropriation as made had been expended as contemplated by Congress it would have been amply sufficient to meet the requirements of that service. Why did it not? In my judgment, based upon the evidence submitted to the committee, we have to-day two systems of naval construction, two policies in respect to the construction of the Navy. One authorized by Congress, and another authorized by the Secretary of the Navy and paid out of the appropriation for maintenance and repairs of machinery. Acting under this latter appropriation the Secretary has ordered what, in the Navy Department, is called "overhauling of battle ships and other naval vessels."

We have been informed that several naval vessels have been ordered out of commission, or are soon to be ordered out of commission, for the purpose of "overhauling," and owing to this unusual expenditure we have an estimated deficiency in this appropriation of $1,000,000.

While the Secretary has obeyed the letter of the law by apportioning this appropriation and then waiving it, he has not complied with the spirit of it for the reason that he does not justify the waiver except by the reason that he believed it necessary to keep the machinery in good repair. That necessity, if it exists at all, existed when the apportionment was made as well as when, four months thereafter, it was waived. He thereby makes his Department the judge of the standard of public expenditure rather than Congress.

It is not, in my judgment, either right or just, or contemplated under our system of government, that the heads of Executive Departments or the Departments themselves should fix the standard of public expenditure, but that this is the function of Congress, and when so fixed that standard must be followed by the Departments.

Mr. Chairman, when Congress made the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, or the appropriation for the maintenance and repairs of machinery, it was the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to insist on that apportionment being carried out unless some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance had occurred which rendered it necessary for him to waive it.

Mr. PALMER. What do you propose to do about it?

Mr. TAWNEY. We propose to amend the law in this respect. The law as it reads to-day requires apportionment of all general and miscellaneous appropriations by monthly allotment or otherwise. This was required by Congress to obviate the necessity for a deficiency or additional appropriation. And then the law says:

All such apportionment shall be adhered to—

That is the present law, and then it reads—

except when waived or modified in specific cases by the written order of the head of Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure.

There is the weak point in the law. It authorizes the Department to waive the apportionment, which apportionment must be made for the purpose of avoiding the necessity for the deficiency or emergency appropriation, and then says that all the Department is required to do in order to justify the waiver is to give Congress the reason for that waiver, not defining the grounds upon which the waiver may be exercised.

Now, we propose to remedy it by striking out that language and inserting the following: "And all apportionments shall be adhered to and shall not be waived or modified, except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment."

That is what Congress means and that is what Congress ought to do and what the Department ought to observe in expending the appropriations we make. When Congress makes an appropriation for the public service, or for any specific branch of the public service, the administrative officer charged with the duty of expending that money should, in the interest of economy and in the interest of the public service, so apportion that appropriation as to meet the ordinary conditions and demands of the service throughout the entire fiscal year. In that case there would be no deficiencies and, in my judgment, the public service would not suffer.

If the appropriation is not sufficient, and in consequence of that fact the public service suffers, the administrative officer is not to blame, but the Congress of the United States is responsible for it. Heretofore they have not allowed Congress to assume this responsibility. They have gone on and expended their appropriations upon the basis of their estimates and their judgment as to what the public expenditure should be and then come to Congress and tell us that unless they can get a deficiency appropriation the public service will inevitably suffer. Under stress of that kind we have been heretofore practically coerced into making appropriations for the deficiency or to provide the money for the remainder of the fiscal year.

Mr. PALMER. What is there in this amendment which the gentleman proposes that will remedy the difficulty? Will not the bureau chiefs and heads of Departments go right on and ignore the law just as they have been doing before?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I say they have not ignored the law. In this case the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] will observe that the apportionment was made in accordance with the law. Subsequently, and long before half of the year had expired, the apportionment was waived in compliance with the law, and the reason for the waiver submitted to Congress, thereby complying with the letter of the law. This reason is given by the Bureau chief in the first instance and subsequently adopted by the Secretary of the Navy—that in view of the fact that the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam Engineering for the current fiscal year—and mark this language—is not sufficient to keep the machinery of our ships in that good condition which should be characteristic of all battle-ship machinery——

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, just a moment. In the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy Congress failed to appropriate enough to meet his standard of what the expenditure in his Department should be. Now, then, under this amendment, if adopted, he could exercise the right of waiver after the apportionment is made only upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which he could not anticipate at the time of making such apportionment.

Now, then, if that emergency happened, if anything happened which the head of the Department or which Congress did not anticipate and could not anticipate at the time of making the apportionment, requiring an extraordinary expenditure in order to protect the property of the United States or in order to perform the service of the Government, there ought to be that opportunity of waiver, and if that right of waiver is exercised then we require that he must submit to Congress the reason for the waiver which would show the particular circumstances under which he assumed to exercise that right of waiver. When they come here giving their reasons for the waiver it is competent then for Congress to determine whether or not the emergency was of that extraordinary character or the circumstance so unusual as not to enable him to anticipate it when making the apportionment and, accordingly as we determine, give or withhold the deficiency appropriation, or take such steps as we may deem necessary in the premises.

Mr. PALMER. That is just the point. He makes the deficiency. The gentleman's complaint is that they have been ignoring the law, or that they have been keeping the letter of the law but ignoring the spirit of the law. But the gentleman anticipates that hereafter if they do not adhere to the letter of the law then Congress can refuse to appropriate for the deficiency if the public service shall not be thereby crippled.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to say that this amendment expresses the spirit of the law as well as the letter of the law, and when it is adopted I would like to know how they are going to evade it.

Mr. PALMER. What is the gentleman going to do about it if they go on and make the deficiency?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the penalties are the penalties fixed by the law to-day. The committee does not attempt to amend the penalties of the existing law; we did not feel that it was necessary or that we would be satisfied in proposing to amend the penal provision of the statute.

Mr. PALMER. The penalty attached is that any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office, and may also be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than one month. Does the gentleman think that is an adequate penalty or that that penalty would ever be enforced, and, if so, who is to enforce it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the penalty prescribed, that of removal from office, is alone sufficient to restrain the head of any one of these Departments from waiving an apportionment, unless the facts under which the right of waiver existed justify his doing it.

Mr. PALMER. But who is to do the removing?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the law as it now stands, it would be by a judicial proceeding. It could be instituted by Congress. For that matter, the courts could be given jurisdiction of the subject-matter of removal in any particular case.

Mr. PALMER. You do not think the President of the United States would ever remove a Cabinet officer for failing to perform his duty in this respect? You do not think a head of a Department would ever remove a chief of one of the divisions for failing to perform his duty in this respect, especially if he had indorsed him?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that a man who is qualified to be at the head of one of these great executive departments of our Government would hesitate a long time before running the chances of being removed for a violation of the law with the administration of which he is charged.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Could Congress remove a Cabinet officer?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Ought not the penalties to be made somewhat more specific?

Mr. TAWNEY. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If I had been drawing the law myself as an original proposition the penalties would have been made more specific; but we thought if we would go to the extent of defining the grounds upon which the right of waiver should be exercised, and then require them to report to Congress in each specific case the grounds upon which they exercised the right of waiver, they would not take any chances in the exercise of the right unless they could come within the grounds that the law specified.

Mr. PALMER. Are you willing to accept an amendment to your amendment here making these penalties a little more specific?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the penalty feature of the law is the law to-day. If the gentleman chooses to draw or amplify the criminal feature of the present law, he can prepare his amendment and I have no objection to the matter at all; but the committee did not want to enter upon the domain of amending the criminal part of a statute. We were simply dealing with the administrative part of it.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman submit to another question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 28, under "Department of Justice," there is an appropriation of $2,615 to pay for the painting of a portrait. Was that in either the spirit or the letter of any existing statute authorizing the expenditure to create a deficiency?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, that question, I would answer, Mr. Chairman, is one that the gentleman can answer as well as I can. Now, I will explain what I mean by that. The payment for the portrait of ex-Attorney-General Knox was made out of an appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice. Congress has, in a large measure, left to the discretion of the Attorney-General and other heads of Departments to determine what are contingent expenses; and because of the custom in the Department or otherwise, if, in his judgment, this item legitimately belonged to the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice the Attorney-General was justified in paying the money out of the particular appropriation. But I want to say this, in justice to the committee—for there was some criticisms on the part of gentlemen here yesterday of the committee putting this item into this bill—estimates for this appropriation came to the committee in this form.

For miscellaneous expenditures, including telegraph, fuel, light, foreign postage, labor, repairs to building, care of grounds, books of reference, periodicals, and other necessaries directly ordered by the Attorney-General, $2,615.

Now, accompanying this estimate, and this is what I want to say in justification of the course the committee has pursued in putting the item into the bill in the language it has—accompanying the estimate is this letter from the Attorney-General, which was read yesterday by my colleague in charge of the bill [Mr. LITTAUER]:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 11, 1905.

The apportionment of the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Department of Justice, miscellaneous items, 1906," for the month of July, 1905, is hereby waived, for the reason that under my direction there was paid therefrom the cost of a portrait of ex-Attorney-General P. C. KNOX, now United States Senator.

W. H. MOODY, Attorney-General.

Now, if we should have appropriated for this deficiency in the language submitted by the Department there is not a man in this House who would have known that that appropriation was for the purpose of reimbursing the contingent fund of the Department of Justice on account of the payment for this portrait, because the language which was sent to us referred to miscellaneous expenditures, including certain things, and not specifically mentioning the real purpose for which the appropriation was intended, and in the judgment of the committee we felt it was due the House that it should know what the appropriation was for and that the appropriation, if made at all, should be made in the open.

Mr. PADGETT. I think the committee was right about that. Now, this further question: Do you, as chairman of the committee, think that this is a legitimate expenditure properly chargeable to a miscellaneous appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that it is the custom in all of the Departments, and has been for some years, that when a retiring head of a Department or retiring bureau officer leaves his position, or soon thereafter, if not before, his portrait adorns the wall of the office in which he serves, and that expenditure has heretofore been paid out of the contingent fund appropriated by Congress for the use of the Department; and I do not think any man can justify it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask this question: This payment has been openly audited, has it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been openly audited.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. So that for a long period of years there is at least a mitigation of the matter, inasmuch as the auditor for the Department in question has always audited these accounts; so that they have not been charged with concealment, inasmuch as there has been no concealment?

Mr. TAWNEY. So far as that is concerned, I do not think there has been any concealment of the fact.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, the gentleman has said that such an item as this has not been brought before the House as it is brought now for the last ten years.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think that the item has been brought to the House in this form.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is the first time, and I think that the committee deserves credit for doing it. Will the gentleman kindly tell me to what extent this matter of picture hanging and oil painting at the expense of the Government is going on?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will go into the Departments, as he frequently does, he will observe that the portraits of the Cabinet officers, at least the Cabinet officers of Presidents Cleveland, Harrison, and McKinley, or, at least, most of them, have been painted and are adorning the walls of their respective offices to-day. I do not know how far back it extends, but for many years, and remember I am not criticising it, I am only criticising doing by indirection that which Congress would not allow to be done directly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It goes down to the subordinates, it seems to me.

Mr. TAWNEY. As the gentleman from Iowa said a moment ago, these accounts must be audited, and to that extent the transaction is an open transaction, and perhaps is a determination by the law department of the Treasury Department that it is a legitimate item of miscellaneous expenditure; but in the judgment of the committee it is not. Although this payment having been made and there being a deficiency, we simply appropriate now to reimburse the fund that we appropriated in the last Congress, and which would have been sufficient but for the payment for this portrait.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman pardon me just an instant? On page 1265 of the RECORD of yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] said:

> We have a good deal of this oil-painting business going on about the Departments. We know that in the House when we want to hang the picture of a Speaker in the Hall we contribute ourselves.

That is, private subscription. But it seems to me this is going on in all of the Departments, and almost any subordinate can get his picture hung up. That is my idea, at least. I do not know whether it is correct or not.

Mr. TAWNEY. We hope by this discussion, if in no other way, to put a stop to the practice.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the practice should extend sufficiently in that, whereas when we require the picture of a Speaker to be hung in the lobby of the House, we shall not require him to pay for it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the Government is big enough to furnish a portrait or painting of the Presidents of the United States and the Speakers that have to be hung on the walls?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly. I think it ought to be done. Let us have the law say so.

Mr. TAWNEY. Most emphatically do I answer in the affirmative.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, it is a mere matter of judgment of the officer in charge.

Mr. LITTAUER. Let us have it specifically appropriated for, whenever such a case comes up, and not hang portraits in every room of every Department of the Government.

Mr. MANN. It can not continue much longer——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We are constantly growing great men in this country, because there is one from Illinois now.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I want to ask him whether under the amendments the gentleman suggests, that "in case said apportionments are waived or modified as herein provided, the same shall be waived or modified in writing by the head of such Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure"—whether the provision "or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure" does not authorize other Government officials other than the heads of Departments?

I call his attention, as an instance where it might, it seems to me, have that effect, to the case of the Marine Corps, that is under the Navy Department, and yet I think the expenditures of that establishment are under the control of the general in charge.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say, in answer to the gentleman, that under a decision rendered by the Attorney-General the question of what constitutes an executive department and what is a governmental establishment is very clearly defined. It was in view of that decision that we modified and changed the language of the existing law with respect to this particular provision, making it applicable to Executive Departments and the heads of other governmental establishments as defined by the Attorney-General. Now, the Attorney-General's decision, as I recollect it, is that an executive department is a department presided over by a Cabinet officer. Take, for example, the postal service independent of the Post-Office Department; that is a governmental establishment. Take the Government Printing Office; that is a governmental establishment. The Smithsonian Institution is a Government establishment, as contradistinguished from a department under the jurisdiction of a Cabinet officer—that is, as we understand the decision of the Attorney-General.

Mr. MANN. And the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Interstate Commerce Commission is also a governmental establishment.

Mr. RIXEY. Is it not a matter of fact that all these are under the executive head of a Cabinet officer?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are not. The Government Printing Office is not under any Cabinet officer; and that is the basis of the decision. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not under any Cabinet officer.

Mr. RIXEY. It seems to me that this provision is a pretty broad one.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is pretty broad, and is intended to be broad. We have served notice on those charged with the duty of administering the expenditure of public appropriations that the Congress of the United States has fixed the standard of public expenditure, and that the Department must govern itself accordingly, and that if, in consequence, the public suffers, Congress and not the Department is responsible.

Mr. RIXEY. It is broad in that, and it is also broad in this: That there are a great many heads of establishments that we know waived this provision of the law. In regard to the Navy Department, there are eight bureaus, and, as I remember the law, the heads of these bureaus have practically the power of controlling every amount apportioned for those bureaus. Now, it is the idea, I understand, of the chairman of the committee in regard to the Navy Department and all of its bureaus, and possibly of the Marine Corps, that waiver must come from the Secretary himself.

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly it must. Now, there is only one other item I want to call attention to.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, before he leaves this subject, what is meant by the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance that could not be anticipated? What sort of a legal construction would the gentleman give to that proposition? What kind of a conscience must the officer have when he makes the waiver under that language?

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois knows just as well as any of us do that we are making appropriations annually to provide for the ordinary administration of the public affairs and to meet the ordinary expenses incident to that administration. We appropriate for the Navy. Take, for example, the appropriation for maintenance and repairs of machinery. Now, that appropriation is based upon past experience in the handling and operating of battle ships and other ships belonging to the Navy.

If, through the negligence of some commanding officer or other cause, these ships meet with an accident unusual in the operation of naval vessels in time of peace that could not be reasonably anticipated from past experience and would constitute an extraordinary emergency and unusual circumstance. Take, for example, the accident that happened in New York Harbor only recently, where there were four or five of our battle ships all tangled up in a knot for a little while. Fortunately no very serious damage resulted, but that would be an extraordinary emergency or unusual occasion if the ships had been damaged to such an extent as to make necessary the expenditure of a million dollars or the balance of all this appropriation. Then, in that case the Secretary of the Navy would be justified in waiving the apportionment and making the expenditure, because the accident would be something that could not be reasonably anticipated when the apportionment was made.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will stop with unusual circumstance or extraordinary emergency, and cases that could not be anticipated when these accidents happen, that would do. But every gentleman in the House here knows that there will be various accidents in the Navy Department and to its machinery next year. We anticipate this. This is not something that is extraordinary and that we do not anticipate. We expect accidents and expect collisions. We all know that two naval vessels will come together during the year.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But we can not anticipate in which allotment period that will occur.

Mr. MANN. That is true; but this must be an emergency that could not be anticipated.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me: If these accidents that he refers to are accidents that we always anticipate, as he says, then they are fully provided for in the regular appropriation for the Navy.

Mr. MANN. Well, perhaps they are not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then if they are not, they are extraordinary and would authorize the waiver of the allotment of the appropriation. In that case more money than we appropriated would be necessary for the service, including such accidents or extraordinary emergencies.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, we anticipate that there will be various expenditures. We anticipate that there will be various accidents to machinery, and repairs of machinery. We make an appropriation, but we can not anticipate how many accidents will happen. But how can you say that any particular accident could not be anticipated, when we have made an appropriation to cover that very identical thing? Now, how much conscience will the executive officer have? Will not this be——

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman will have to appeal to higher authority for an answer to that question. I can not answer it.

Mr. PALMER. You are not an authority on conscience? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It will become a mere pro forma matter, if the gentleman leaves it in the language that he has it in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I will call attention briefly to a statement I have prepared, showing or tending to show the effect of the present law. The urgent deficiency bill of the Fifty-eighth Congress carried deficiencies for identically the same Departments and for the same purposes that are covered in this bill, which are deficiencies arising in the annual appropriation bill—$7,556,606.15. Now, that bill in the aggregate carried over $16,000,000, but all of this sum was not appropriations that we term deficiencies arising in annual and miscellaneous appropriations. Now, the deficiencies, since the enactment of this antideficiency law, which we have reported in this bill, are $3,476,042.30, or, in other words, the deficiencies in the annual appropriations and the miscellaneous appropriations for the current fiscal year are less than one-half what they were in the urgent deficiency bill of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt——

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not say this reduction is entirely due to this law, but that marked reduction is an indication of what this law has accomplished along the line of compelling the Departments to keep within the standard of public expenditure which Congress has fixed by its appropriations. Now, there is only one other item that I want to call attention to——

Mr. STERLING. What would be the result if Congress should fail or refuse to make appropriations for the several items contained in this bill, or some of them? They have been paid, as I understand it.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; some of them are anticipated deficiencies.

Mr. STERLING. This picture has been paid for?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. What would be the result if Congress should amend this bill, refusing to appropriate that item?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The time for general debate has now expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman's question under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE—FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation "Contingent expenses, foreign missions," for the fiscal year 1905, including all objects mentioned under this title of appropriation in the diplomatic and consular appropriation act for the fiscal year 1905, $21,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think it would be well for the very distinguished gentleman in charge of the bill to explain at the outset a few of these items, so that the members of the committee may understand how these deficiencies arise. Here is one that contains as little information on its face as any I can think of.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed to respond to the interrogation of the gentleman. The first item reached in the bill is $21,000 for contingent expenses of foreign missions for the year 1905. There is another item for the contingent expenses of United States consulates at the bottom of the same page, which belongs in the same category. According to the audited accounts of the Auditor for the State Department, these sums of money have been expended. The appropriation became exhausted. The officers of the Government were obliged to pay the contingent expenses of their offices during the last quarter of the fiscal year last passed out of their own pockets, and—this is the statement of the Department—the Department will therefore require for their relief, to enable the Auditor to settle up the accounts at diplomatic and consular offices for the contingent expenses of the fiscal year which ended June 30 last, additional appropriations for foreign missions $21,000, and for United States consulates $30,000. This applies to 1905, the year previous to the limitation placed upon deficiencies in the last bill. These were actual deficiencies, and we inserted them in the bill.

At the same time the Department of State advised us that the appropriation made for this same purpose last year was not sufficient to carry on the work of the Department and that it would need immediately further-anticipated deficiency amounts. Those we refused to insert, believing it was the duty of the Department to so apportion the amount appropriated by Congress as to keep within the limits of that appropriation.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I agree with the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations. The appropriations for this service, of course, are not made through the gentleman's committee.

Mr. LITTAUER. They are carried on the diplomatic bill.

Mr. MANN. Now, we have two items in the bill—one for deficiency for 1905, and the next item is for a deficiency for the same purpose in 1904. Here is going to be the result if the law is enforced about deficiencies in the future. We have a deficiency of $21,000 for one year, over $22,000 for the next year, expenses legitimately incurred, I suppose, over and above the amount allowed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House. You now cut that down and what is the result?

Mr. LITTAUER. We do not cut it down; we refuse to appropriate the deficiency.

Mr. MANN. You very properly, from the standpoint of your committee, refuse to make an appropriation which, if it belongs anywhere, belongs originally in another appropriation bill. In respect to that I think it is wise judgment, but it has a bearing upon your proposition.

Mr. LITTAUER. This brings us back again to the question of having the Appropriation Committee annually estimate these contingent expenses. The Department of State, both for foreign consulates and for foreign missions, has demanded deficiency year after year, and, in my opinion, no proper estimate has been made, based upon past experience, in the beginning of the year, so that the committee in charge of the matter appropriating for this purpose could allow a sum that would be sufficient or 10 or 20 per cent more than sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the time of the gentleman extended in order to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine move to strike out the last word?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do. I would like to inquire whether, as to this particular appropriation that is now being discussed, the Department of State made any allotment under the law adopted at the last session?

Mr. LITTAUER. In writing, stating that such allotment had been made.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Has the committee in its possession the written order of the Department changing the allotment so as to allow the expenditure?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the item being now discussed; it is for a deficiency in the year that ended in 1905, where no waiver was required according to law.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And does that apply to both items?

Mr. LITTAUER. That covers both items. We, however, did have estimates for deficiencies for the present year, and those were refused, believing that the Department should confine itself to its apportionment and the amount appropriated.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In other words, that the Department should run its business in accordance with the appropriation rather than the estimate. I agree with the gentleman on that proposition. Now, I would like to make another inquiry. Is it or not a fact that the appropriation committee has in its possession, in the case of deficiencies for this fiscal year, the necessary correspondence showing the circumstances under which these deficiencies have arisen?

Mr. LITTAUER. Each submission of deficiency, anticipated or actual, during the year 1906 has been accompanied by a transcript of the order of waiver; not in all cases, but in many cases.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then I would like to make this suggestion, because I think the House is anxious to understand the circumstances under which deficiencies have arisen. Members understand that the amendment placed on the appropriation bill at the last session was predicated on the hypothesis that we could trust the discretion of the heads of Departments for one year and we would see what they would do. I would like to know what they have done. I want to see now the correspondence between the Secretary of Agriculture and the chairman of the committee, and I want to say that in my judgment, if I am correctly informed, it is not satisfactory as to the circumstances under which it was made.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think if the gentleman will look into the bill he will see that that was refused.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not mean to say that it is not satisfactory as far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, because it is. I think he discharged his proper duty in his part of the correspondence, but I do not think the circumstances given by the Secretary of Agriculture are adequate or sufficient. What I would like to have done is to have the committee insert in the RECORD, if we do not get through with this bill to-day, all that correspondence, so that we can see it and know what we are talking about. Let the House see it if we do not get through with this bill to-day. Put it in the RECORD, so that over Sunday we can see under what circumstances these apportionments were waived.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman only wants this in connection with the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Every Department of the Government that has had occasion to make any waiver.

Mr. LITTAUER. That would make a large book.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well; we ought to have it if we can get it. These are important matters. We want to know whether we are appropriating this money or whether it is the Departments that are appropriating it.

I want to know whether we regulate the expenditure or whether they do.

Mr. TAWNEY. Permit me to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that the correspondence he refers to is all contained in House documents, about 1,800 copies of which are printed, all for the use of the Members of the House. If the gentleman will refer to the report of the committee on this bill, he will see the number of each one of these House documents, and if he will send a page to the document room he can obtain a copy of each one of them, and he can take them home with him to-morrow and study them, because they give all the information he would have if they were printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But it would be vastly more convenient for the Members——

Mr. TAWNEY. Just as it is in this form of document. They can put them in their pockets and take them home.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think it is more convenient for us to have this correspondence in the RECORD. Of course, I do not insist upon it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If he will look at the report of the gentleman in charge of this bill he will see there the number of all of the documents transmitting the deficiency items.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, I see; beginning House Documents Nos. 53, 58, etc. So that all we have to do is to call on that gentleman for all of these documents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that his time may be further extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York may be extended for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If I understand the distinguished chairman of the committee correctly, all we have to do is to call for these various documents, and we will get precisely the information I have been inquiring for, so that we will be advised in relation to all these items.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is as far as the Committee on Appropriations is advised in connection with each submitted deficiency.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Has the Committee on Appropriations been advised with reference to all these items that relate to the year 1906 by the heads of Departments, as to whether or not they have or have not complied with the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. As to the deficiency estimates which come under the provisions of this law—that is, the annual and miscellaneous appropriations—the gentleman will find all the information in these documents the committee has, and in almost all cases there has been a waiver, and the reasons for the waiver are stated. I do not know whether the gentleman was here a moment ago when I called attention to the language of the waiver in the Navy Department.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I was not.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is all in this document, and he will get all the information that the committee has.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. My inquiry is this: Whether all of the Departments that are calling now for a deficiency for the year 1906 have complied with the provisions of the law and have given the committee the evidence thereof in the case of all of the items?

Mr. LITTAUER. They have not done so in connection with all of the items, but as a rule, at least, those submissions for deficiencies where the waiver has not been plainly stated have usually been dropped out.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then they are not in the bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. No.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What I want to inquire about is as to items in the bill. Are there any items there as to which they have not given that information? If there are, we ought to vote them out.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not remember just at this moment that there is a single item in the bill that has not been covered by a proper waiver—yes, there is; for instance, the deficiency item to add $30,000 for fuel for the schools in the District of Columbia. That was not properly waived.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was not waived at all, it was not apportioned.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of course the gentleman will appreciate this fact. The reason for my making this inquiry is this, that if there are such items, when we reach them I think it is the duty of the House to examine into them and investigate and ascertain whether or not any Department of this Government has intentionally and deliberately violated a statute, and if there has been such violation, then we ought to strike out the appropriation and ought not to continue to appropriate. I do not want to interrogate the gentleman as to every item in this bill, and if he will specify a little later the particular item as to which there has neither been a compliance of the law nor excuse therefor, then we can tell whether we ought to allow it.

Mr. LITTAUER. This bill was framed practically with that idea in view.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Permit me to say that it ought to have been done.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then I will inquire about every item if I have to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, no part of which sum shall be disbursed for services rendered or expenses incurred within the District of Columbia.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 6, after the word "Columbia," insert "except for the entertainment of foreign dignitaries."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the language be changed. I suggest to my colleague that he change it to "except for the entertainment of visiting representatives of foreign governments."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I was about to explain the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope the gentleman will change the language.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point that the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order was taken late, as discussion had commenced upon the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Chair heard me trying to get the attention of the Chair too late, it was not my fault. I was endeavoring to secure the attention of the Chair to the best of my ability.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the point of order is reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just the moment the Clerk had finished reading the amendment I arose and addressed the Chair. At that time the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] arose, and his voice, perhaps being stronger, might have drowned mine out, but I was doing the best I could. I could not make the point of order before the Clerk had read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair of course accepts the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi. If he was attempting to gain the attention of the Chair, the Chair did not hear him. With that statement, of course the Chair withdraws the ruling that the point of order comes too late, and the point of order is reserved.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the re-reporting of the amendment? If not, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph to which this amendment applies. It applies to unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service and to extend commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirements of section 291 of the Revised Statutes. The appropriation was $50,000. Now, in the diplomatic bill of this year a provision was added that reads this way:

The Secretary of State is authorized to apply, in his discretion, such portions of the appropriation for contingent expenses, foreign missions, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, to the maintenance, driving, and operating such carriages or vehicles as may be necessary for the use of the Assistant Secretaries of the Department of State in the duties officially devolving upon them, and further to apply upon the order of the President such proportion of any fund which may properly be applied to the entertainment of visiting functionaries of foreign governments to such temporary hire of carriages as may be required for the use of such Assistant Secretaries in emergencies arising in connection with the necessary entertainment of such functionaries of foreign governments in the United States, or in such other emergencies as may require such expenditures to be made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who wrote that bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is part of the diplomatic appropriation bill passed by the Congress last year. Now, in the legislative bill we have for a number of years been attempting to control the use of private carriages, except by the heads of Departments and the President, and this has been the attempt, or rather the success, of the State Department to have the carriages for their Assistant Secretaries exempt, as they had to come back to the Appropriations Committee for a deficiency in this regard caused largely by the peace treaty conference held at Portsmouth, for which we were advised $26,000 out of the $50,000 appropriated last year had been used. We sought to bring——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did that bill become a law as you read it?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is the law. We sought to bring the Assistant Secretaries of State, who had been permitted the use of carriages under the paragraph to enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service—we sought to have the regulation of the use of carriages as far as we could placed on the same plane as it is in all the other Departments, and consequently we omitted all that part of the present law, and moreover allowed the $50,000 for the general expenditure in connection with unforeseen emergencies. Now, then, it appeared that part of this fund must necessarily be spent on the visiting representatives of other governments here in the District of Columbia.

We had at first confined it to the District of Columbia. When our attention was called to that necessity the amendment which I offered became necessary, and I would ask permission, Mr. Chairman, that the language be changed to conform with the law as it now stands, "except for the entertainment of visiting functionaries of foreign governments."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does not the gentleman think that "representatives" of foreign governments a little better than the word "functionaries?"

Mr. LITTAUER. I will accept the language "representatives of foreign governments."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk reread the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of making a point of order, which I reserve. I have, of course, no objection to the entertainment of ambassadors and functionaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule unless the gentleman from Mississippi desires to be heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to that. We can make an appropriation whenever it is required for that purpose. I do not think this is a deficiency, and I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I want to make an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] first arose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have just one inquiry to make. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] under what circumstances this deficiency of $50,000 arises? The gentleman has already called attention to the peace conference, which amounts to about $20,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Japanese and Russian war.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is expended out of this fund the pay of emergency clerks in connection with the Bureau of Reciprocity. That amount is $7,760.62.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What I want to know is how there happens to be a deficiency in that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. It is all out of order. Has the Chair ruled on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not, but the Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the provision already in the bill is a limitation on the appropriation, and this is merely excepted from the limitation, and clearly is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Clearly the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct. This is a limitation on the appropriation which the amendment attempts to perfect. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and make this inquiry of the gentleman from New York: I would like to have the gentleman explain the circumstances under which this whole deficiency of $50,000 arises. The matter of the expenditure of this $7,000 for the reciprocity clerks is all right, so far as it goes, but it is stopping there, and does not show any deficiency. How does it happen that when they apportion this expenditure over the whole year they were obliged to change the apportionment, or the larger part of it, in the earlier part of the year?

Mr. LITTAUER. The extraordinary occurrence at Portsmouth.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It amounts to $26,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. And we had the visit here of the Prince of Battenburg.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. How much was that?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am informed the total amount expended in his entertainment was $4,700.20.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Those are things I can see could not be properly anticipated. How about the others?

Mr. TAWNEY. It was explained to the committee, I would say, that there was a great deal of service in connection with our relations with certain foreign governments.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Incidental to these matters?

Mr. TAWNEY. Incidental to the war between Japan and Russia.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a balance now left over. Yet that appropriation is not expended, but it is anticipated there would be in the early future necessity for more money than is yet unexpended, and that in view of the coming of some very important gentlemen from foreign nations, including the Chinese——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then it is not a deficiency at all?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is an anticipated deficiency.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I make the point of order, then, if the committee have included here——

Mr. MANN. It is a deficiency for this fiscal year.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is a submission on an appropriation that the amount appropriated will not carry through for the present year, giving the reasons and requesting an amount necessary to carry on the work of the Bureau without detriment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In other words, that an event is to happen, and when the event happens they have not the money to pay for it.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is the whole point.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And the committee are satisfied, under the circumstances, that all this expenditure is germane?

Mr. LITTAUER. We are.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then I have no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question in reference to these transactions. Under what other appropriations are paid the expenses of foreign representatives?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no other. It is the only fund under which the expenses of entertaining foreign representatives can be paid.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What kind of entertainment does this presume?

Mr. LITTAUER. Such as the President may determine upon.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not include their entertainment in the White House?

Mr. LITTAUER. "So as to enable the President."

The Clerk read as follows:

That not to exceed $5,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $20,000 made by the sundry civil act of March 3, 1905, for furnishing complete the legation buildings in Peking, China, may be used for improving the legation grounds at Peking, China.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will ask the gentleman if this is a deficiency?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not a deficiency. It transfers a certain amount which has been appropriated for the building and the inclosure owned by the United States at Peking, China. A sum was left over, and the State Department advised us that the condition of the ground there is so very bad that in order to make the establishment presentable $5,000 of unexpended balance should be permitted for this use.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And there is no other appropriation?

Mr. LITTAUER. This is an appropriation for the furnishing of the legation building in Peking.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following additional force to be employed in redeeming the national currency (to be reimbursed by the national banks) for the balance of the fiscal year 1906, namely: For six expert counters, at the rate of $900 each per annum; six expert counters, at the rate of $800 each per annum; and one charwoman, at the rate of $240 per annum; in all, $4,350, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, so that I may get some explanation of this appropriation. It strikes me from what we have heard here in this House about the heads of Departments exceeding their authority under existing law that it will be good policy to have this appropriation explained to know whether the Departments are creating new officers to draw salaries.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is an appropriation to cover work in connection with the redemption of the national-bank currency. The number of counters employed depends upon the amount of national-bank currency redeemed. An extraordinary proportion of this work has been going on, and it is practically a cumulative one, but it has been extraordinary lately, and there have been details from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to help out the work. The congestion is very great at the Treasurer's office in this work. A very good case has been made out as to the necessity of this extraordinary employment, and I will say they are paid out of a fund assessed upon the national banks.

Mr. MACON. That is the question I would like to ask, Why is it that the Government is to be reimbursed by the national banks? Why is it not just as easy for the national banks to advance the money for the Government as the Government to advance it for the national banks?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think I can answer the gentleman. The money is already advanced, and you simply fix the salary. The money is already paid in by the national banks.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I think the United States pays this money and the banks reimburse the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the banks are liable for it.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is for handling the national-bank redemption.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. MACON. I was trying to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question when I was interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York attempted to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MACON. I ask the simple question, Why does it become necessary that the Government of the United States should advance money to pay the officials to do service for which the national banks will ultimately pay?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is done under the authority of law covering such redemption, by statute.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that the reason why it is done is because the amount that it costs the national banks can only be ascertained after the work has been completed, and when the work is done an account is rendered to them.

Mr. LITTAUER. That may be the reason, but the operation is under authority of law and controlled by the statute.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; the last two words, simply for this purpose. I understand, after the explanation of the gentleman, that this does not create any additional burden upon the United States Government; but I should like to inquire whether the bill itself contains any provisions creating additional offices? I have not had time to look it all through.

Mr. LITTAUER. It does.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can the gentleman give them to us?

Mr. LITTAUER. Only one, I believe, an assistant to the Chief of the Bureau of Manufactures.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can the gentleman, without too much trouble, give us, before we get through with the bill, a memorandum of the offices created and the amount of salaries attached thereto by this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think that is the only one.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In order to be entirely frank about it, I want to state that my reason is that I have had occasion recently to investigate the question of the creation of offices on appropriation bills, and as soon as I get an opportunity I am going to discuss that question; and I will say here now briefly that the habit of creating offices, with the salaries attached thereto, has increased enormously during the last four or five years as compared with the eight or ten years prior to 1897. A little later I want to call the attention of the House to that, and for that reason I wanted to know whether this bill is subject to that criticism.

Mr. LITTAUER. The entire work of the Government has increased enormously during the last few years, based upon the total amount of appropriations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But there is no increase in the work of the Government that can legitimately account for the discrepancy in the increase in the offices created.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] if it would not be well to amend by putting the word "bank" between the words "national" and "currency" there?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will yield it for the purpose of allowing this question to be answered, if gentlemen will not take up all my time.

Mr. LITTAUER. I did not understand the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That the word "bank" be inserted before the word "currency."

Mr. LITTAUER. I think "national currency" is the proper title of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is that the legal definition?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; I think so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was in the Treasurer's office this morning, and he spoke to me about these necessary experts. I asked him if he had all the help that he needed to carry out a clean-money law, if we passed one, and he said he did, except that he needed, I think, seven—I see here the number is placed at eight—expert counters, to count the dirty, rotten, filthy, bacteria-carrying, disease-breeding paper money that is flooding the country with disease. [Applause.] You gentlemen see how important it is. If you would just see this money coming in down there you would think some foreign animal had come in and died, to judge by the smell.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I make a suggestion that will facilitate the suggestion of my friend from Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You can always do that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I learned recently on the question of bacteria that when discovered in Germany they were "Germs;" in France, "Parisites;" in Ireland, "Mike-robes," and when they were gone not to return they were then "Back-teria." [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, if we stop the circulation of this dirty money we will prevent a great many of these defalcations that we hear about. In many cases I have little doubt that the bacteria get hold of some of the public funds and run off with them. [Laughter.] At all events, Mr. Chairman, it is very necessary to have these eight clerks. Right on that point I desire, with the permission of the committee, to print in the RECORD some correspondence on this subject from a Boston merchant.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the letters referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

JANUARY 13, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We learned through the public prints that you are preparing to introduce a bill in the House that will provide for more speedy retirement of Government paper when it becomes dirty than is now the practice. We are very much interested in this proposed measure, as for the past three years we have been giving to customers in our store as change new money, both bills and coin—that is, money that has never before been circulated. We were at first led to take this step at an expense to ourselves, because it was a novel practice and because we believed that the trading public would appreciate and respond to our effort to prevent the danger of contagion from infected paper money and coin. The policy of giving out such new money has proved to be extremely popular, and we think that the general adoption of the plan would follow the passing of such a measure as it is reported that you are about to introduce.

Since we first became interested in this subject of clean money we have collected some literature on the subject which has been taken from scientific and medical journals, etc. If it would interest you to look over any of this literature, we shall be glad to put it in your possession.

We shall also be glad to learn whether we can give you any assistance of any other character.

Yours, very truly,

WM. FILENE'S SONS COMPANY,

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 15th, we wish to advise you that we have received the copies of your House bill No. 5302 and that we shall be glad to give you all the support we can toward the passage of this bill. During the last two days we have written to each one of our Massachusetts Representatives, advising them of our interest in your bill and inclosing a sheet showing briefly the different arguments that have been made in scientific and medical journals in favor of a cleaner circulating medium. We inclose herewith copy of this statement.

Please be assured that we shall consider it a privilege to help you in any manner possible toward the passage of this bill, and shall be glad if you will advise us of any assistance that we may be able to render.

Yours, very truly,

WM. FILENE'S SONS COMPANY,
T. R. SIMPSON.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, as follows:

Collecting the revenue from customs: To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, being additional to the permanent appropriation for this purpose, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, $1,500,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following: "Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used for the payment of expenses of a customs office where the expenses of said office are in excess of the revenue receipts therefrom."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that changes existing law.

Mr. MACON. I desire to be heard on that, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I reserve the point of order in order to allow the gentleman to discuss it. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask that the amendment be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I should be perfectly clear that this was obnoxious to the last part of the second section of Rule XXI if it applied to any part of the permanent appropriation which is provided by section 3687, Revised Statutes. I am not clear, from the reading of the amendment, whether or not it is obnoxious to the point of order, but as the point of order has been reserved I should like to discuss the question for the five minutes which are allowed me, on the merits of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman does not wish to discuss the point of order, the Chair prefers to rule upon it. It is apparent to the Chair that the amendment proposed is a limitation on the appropriation, and is not obnoxious to the rule; therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. Now, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts to discuss the merits of the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the different custom-houses that have been established for a very long time are governed by different conditions. Now, if any of these custom-houses are affected by this additional appropriation, it will work a very great injustice in the existing state of affairs. There are in the district I represent certain custom-houses which I think would be seriously interfered with if they should suddenly find themselves, by an item in the appropriation bill, unable to pay the current expenses which they have already been authorized to contract. If it is desired, as the following section in this bill seems to indicate, to dispense with these custom-houses, either by combining them or abolishing them, let Congress decently chloroform the patient and not try to exterminate him by starving him to death. [Laughter.] But so far as inserting an amendment like this in an urgent deficiency bill is concerned, I think it quite wrong.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, within the few minutes at my disposal I desire to answer some of the arguments that have been expressed here in advocacy of a custom-house where they pay nothing in receipts, and yet burden the people greatly with taxation. For instance, take one that was mentioned by a member of the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE], the one in North Carolina, where the expense for maintaining that particular custom-house is $1,400 per annum and not a single cent of revenue is received therefrom—I do not understand how anyone could justify such an act as that.

Yesterday it was mentioned here in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE], who offered some arguments against such a condition, that a post-office sometimes had to be maintained at an expense; in other words, that the receipts from a post-office were not sufficient to defray the expenses thereof. I undertake to say that there is not a post-office in the United States—I do not care how inferior it may be—where it does not receive a single cent to defray any part of the expenses of the maintenance of that office. We know, sir, that the postmasters in the interior places are paid from the cancellation of stamps, and the only part of his salary that the Government pays is the value of the paper that the stamps are printed upon and the amount that it has to pay for the printing of them.

Here is a custom-house that is a charge upon the Government to the amount of $1,400 per year—enough to maintain a family or eight or ten, in order to support one individual, when he does not collect a single cent to go into the Treasury as a return for his services. Hence, sir, I say that that kind of condition ought to be obnoxious to every fair-minded individual. It was also argued here that the reason we had to maintain customs offices at points like the one mentioned was because there would be some smuggling if they did not have the customs officer there. That, sir, is not tenable. We do not have a custom-house at every point on our coast, east and west, that can be reached by vessels, and if they are going into the smuggling business, why don't they go to some point where they can land and put their smuggled goods upon our shores and yet evade the custom-houses as now constituted or located?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not think the gentleman's amendment goes far enough. If you abolish, which this amendment practically does, the collection of customs at any point where the expenses are more than the revenues——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There must be an official there for other purposes. There must be licenses granted from that place; there must be ships sailing from there doing coastwise business, and there are other things that must be attended to by some Government official. The gentleman's amendment ought to go further and provide for that by a deputy appointed there for special occasions by the nearest collector of the port.

Mr. MACON. Then I would be changing existing law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, the gentleman is doing so now.

Mr. MACON. No, sir; I apprehend under the ruling of the Chair that I am not; I am simply putting a limitation upon an appropriation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And that is the reason he lets you in.

Mr. MACON. And I want to tell the gentleman right here, sir, that if this amendment is adopted it will be the abolishment of all those offices in the United States where we are paying as much as $1,400 to collect nothing, or as much as $300 to collect $1.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But why does not the gentleman go further and provide for the other part of the service to be attended to? That is all I suggest to him.

Mr. MACON. We will cross that bridge when we get to it. We want to limit this appropriation now. As I understand, it is the only way that you can touch this proposition at this particular time on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Allow me to suggest, along the line he was speaking a minute ago, in regard to the objection that some post-offices of the country did not pay the expenses, is it not a fact post-offices are established for entirely different purposes; not for the purpose of raising revenue, but for the purpose of serving the people in another way, so that the objection heard on yesterday does not lie?

Mr. MACON. Certainly. The post-offices were established for different purposes than that of bringing revenue into the Government. They were established for the purpose of accommodating the people by taking their mail to them, no matter how remotely they might be domiciled, and therefore the comparison was unfortunate when it was lugged into the argument yesterday comparing the post-offices, instruments for carrying the mail to the humblest sections of our country, with an institution which requires the payment of as much as fourteen hundred dollars per annum to some one who does not do a solitary thing for the Government. That is what I am complaining of—complaining of the system, sir—a system that takes as much as fourteen hundred dollars from the taxpayers of the country and gives it to a single individual who does not do a continental thing to earn a single penny of it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was awaiting recognition to move to strike out two more words, because I can not in the form of a question state what I wish to state to the House.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, we find this evil existing all over the United States. I have pointed out one in the section of country from whence I come. Members who represent districts in which these evils exist object to my amendment because they want the pay of fourteen hundred dollars a year to go to some constituent of theirs. I thank God I am not built in such form as to want the taxpayers of this country to pay anything to maintain a citizen living within the confines of my district where he gives them nothing in return. I believe, sir, that it is an evil that ought to be abolished, that ought to be accursed everywhere, it makes no difference whether it is located in the South, in my particular Congressional district, or in any other particular section of this country or particular Congressional districts. Whenever any species of legislation or whenever any species of conduct of the Government of this United States seeks to impose a burden on the many for the purpose of benefiting a single individual or a very few individuals, I say it becomes obnoxious to the point that it ought to be cursed by the voters of this great country, and certainly by the intelligent Representatives whom they have sent to this House to vote for their benefit and not vote to injure them in any degree. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, no doubt there is something here that ought to be remedied, but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas affords no remedy whatever. These salaries for these collectors are provided by law, and no matter whether we appropriate for them in this bill or not the United States is legally liable for every dollar of salary, and they can go to the Court of Claims and recover it, but if the amendment was effective to wipe out these offices, then the Congress would do a great injury to the collection of revenues from customs. A great many of these officers are necessary whether they collect a dollar or not. There is one port, I think Brownsville, in Texas, where the expenses are some $40,000 more than the revenues collected, and yet that port is absolutely necessary to prevent smuggling along the border, and we could not get along without it. We would lose a great deal more than we would gain if we struck out this salary and allowed smuggling to become a lucrative business along that border. Now, that is the case with some other ports. Then there are some ports where it is necessary to have a collector and to have an office for the entrance and clearance of vessels, and we must maintain those. This amendment would not wipe out these places; it would simply postpone the payment of the salary until after a judgment of the Court of Claims; but, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means have had a bill under consideration that will effect a remedy. I have been authorized by that committee to report that bill favorably, and expect to report it and get consideration of it in the House in a very few days. That bill, I think, will prove an adequate remedy and a real remedy for this trouble.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him and say I am powerful glad to hear it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I am powerful glad that the gentleman is powerful glad, so that I hope I shall have his support when we get the bill here before the House. Now, I think this amendment ought to be voted out for the reason that I have stated—that is, it furnishes no adequate remedy; it only embarrasses these officials, and if it would do what the gentleman wants to accomplish, the abolition indiscriminately of these ports where the cost of collection is more than the money collected, it would do a grave injustice to the shipping interests of the country, and also open up the door for fraud upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him once more and offer to trade with him? I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman will report his bill right away.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not report it at this moment, but I will report it very promptly.

Mr. MACON. If the gentleman promises to report it promptly I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 3687 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is repealed to take effect from and after June 30, 1907, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for the fiscal year 1908, and annually thereafter, submit to Congress, in the regular Book of Estimates, detailed estimates of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved. If the gentleman does not care to make it, the Chair will rule on it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Then I make the point of order without further discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of silver coin: To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Transportation of silver coin" for the fiscal year 1905, $3,426.65.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $10,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I shall be compelled to make a point of order against that amendment. It is not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] makes the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order first.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will suggest that while the gentleman from Connecticut was making the point of order the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut was on his feet when the Clerk was reading the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know on what theory the gentleman makes the point of order. That is the reason I would like to have him talk first. Then I would like to be heard.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman is too good a lawyer to expect that I am going to prove a negative. I make the point of order on the ground that the appropriation is not authorized by existing law, and if he thinks it is, his business is to prove it first. I will refer to Rule XXI, and make the point of order on that, as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

I make the point of order, basing it on section 2, each and every clause from beginning to end showing that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I think the closing part of the gentleman's statement was a very proper one for him to make, because it is not possible for this point of order to be sustained against anything he could name, so he says he wants it to be ruled out of order under each and all of them. No one of them applies, as we will see. In the first place, the amendment does not change existing law, and it is an appropriation that comes clearly within this second paragraph of Rule XXI, as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, this amendment is to make an appropriation in pursuance of existing law. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly I do. Of course I do, and I ask the gentleman to submit any law he can find in justification of this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I am prepared to do that. As the gentleman is unable to find anything in support, I suppose I will be driven to look up the law for him. On the 3d of March, 1905, the sundry civil appropriation bill was passed, providing an appropriation relating to the transportation of silver coin for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906. I will hand him the statute if he prefers to read it. That expressly provides for the transportation of the coin of this country at the expense of the Government, and we appropriated, under the terms of that law, $120,000 to do it for the whole of that fiscal year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Silver coin.

Mr. KEIFER. I should say silver coin and all of them. The gentleman is right about that. And we then appropriated $120,000 to do that. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury sent an estimate to Congress and the Committee on Appropriations, saying that for the purpose of carrying out that particular law he had to have $10,000 more money; and my amendment just sent up is to give that $10,000 to carry on the law of March 3, 1905. Perhaps I had better read the statute. I will say that the provision put in the appropriation act would read precisely, save as to the amount, in the words contained in the amendment, without a change in the law, without a change of punctuation. I better read. The Chair has the amendment.

For the transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $120,000—

Now, the amendment adds $10,000; that is all—

and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment that was sent up was to complete the transportation of silver coin for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the act of March 17, 1881, carried a general provision for the transportation of subsidiary coin and silver coin at the expense of the Government, and ever since that day every sundry civil bill has carried an appropriation for this purpose. That is a general provision.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is right about it. But wait a moment, please. Earlier than 1881, as early as 1878, the law was held to be that the Government should pay for transporting silver coin, and it is unchanged, including the act that my friend the member of the committee refers to. From 1878 to the present hour it has been the law of this country that silver coin should be carried at the expense of the Government.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman pardon me? Will he not admit that prior to the time of which he speaks the law provided that the transportation should be from the profit fund, and that that law still exists, and this is an entirely different provision?

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I did not expect to debate this amendment for the purpose of entertaining the gentleman on the question of old existing laws. There was an act of 1853 that had some limitations. It was only for the shipments to assistant treasurers and depositories and officers of the Goverment; but that law was amended. After the act of 1878 was passed that provided for the coinage of silver dollars, the act of February 28, 1878, as I recollect it—John Sherman was Secretary of the Treasury—in September, 1878, he gave a construction to the then existing law that has never since changed, in which he said that the Government was authorized to send silver dollars out for distribution at the cost of the Government. It will be found in the hearings before the subcommittee of the House of Representatives for our Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me a moment, he does not claim that the circular of Mr. Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, was issued under any such provision as that under which is authorized the transportation of silver coin. I have read the law, and it is in existence, and it is a very different proposition from this entirely.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman would like to question Secretary Sherman's knowledge of the law.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. We followed that law from 1878 down to the present hour.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am not questioning Mr. Sherman's knowledge of the law, but I am questioning the knowledge of the gentleman as to the law under the provisions of which Secretary Sherman issued that circular.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is troubling the gentleman is that we fell into a custom here that has run through the period largely since 1878, in making appropriations for the transportation of silver coin, of simply reenacting the same thing every year and sometimes twice a year. On the 3d day of March, 1905, you reenacted that law twice. You put it into the sundry civil bill that became a law on that day and you put it into the deficiency bill that became a law on that day, so you reenacted it twice the same day in the same Congress, and it is in force now. My amendment is to appropriate $10,000, the exact sum that the Secretary of the Treasury says is necessary to carry out the provisions of the existing law, which require him to send, upon the call of individuals or banks, silver coin, standard silver dollars, and subsidiary silver coin free wherever they may be asked for.

That is the status, and it is in pursuance of that request of the Secretary, that estimate of the Secretary, in carrying out the act of March 3, 1905. In some instances they have only put a clause in the deficiency bill, saying "to continue the appropriation." That is, in effect, a reenacting of it, and it has so stood and still stands; so that my amendment, which is to make an appropriation of $10,000, is in pursuance of existing law, unchanged for at least fifty years.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think if there is one thing that is pretty thoroughly established in this House it is that no item can be placed in an appropriation bill until it has been previously authorized by some law. If it is so placed it is subject to a point of order, and at least one has gone out of this appropriation bill on a point of order. What the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] claims as his authority for this amendment is the following, and I ask Members to consider this——

Mr. KEIFER. Will you allow me to make another suggestion on a proposition that I omitted? And then you can answer. In other words, I wish to call the attention of the Chairman to another clause of this second paragraph of Rule XXI, which clearly also brings this amendment in as in order. I read:

Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

So my amendment is to provide for a continuation of an appropriation for an object already in progress. The clause just before the place where I desire the amendment to come in is to pay for an indebtedness that has grown up in the year 1905, growing out of a deficiency, and I now want to provide for the same thing for this fiscal year.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, the authority which the gentleman cites is as follows. I read from the sundry civil bill of last year:

Transportation of silver coin: For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $120,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport—

And so forth.

We gave authority for the expenditure of $120,000; not a cent more or a cent less. It authorized the performance of no duties whatever by the Treasury Department, except to carry out that expenditure of that money in a certain way. It was no authority of law which would justify the insertion of a like item in an appropriation bill this year, if the point of order was raised against it. Now, I will give the authority——

Mr. KEIFER. In order that you may not make a speech on a matter that is not before the committee, allow me to say that this is not an appropriation for the fiscal year that is coming, but for the existing one.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is for duties yet to be performed, to be authorized by this appropriation of $10,000. I raise no point of order against the amount that has actually been contracted for, which is already provided for in the bill, but it is against the gentleman's amendment appropriating for future services to be rendered and for which he wishes to pay, and for which there is no authority of law whatever and never has been.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to justify that I call the Chairman's attention, on page 345 of the Manual, to the question of "public works," to which the gentleman refers. The ruling was as follows:

A public work or object, to come within the terms of the rule, must be actually in progress.

This is for work to be done in the future. It is not to pay for what has already been done, but for work that is yet to be done, and the gentleman now wants to authorize the Treasury Department to do it by giving them $10,000 with which to do it. Let me quote another decision:

By public works and objects already in progress are meant tangible matters, like buildings, roads, and not duties in an executive department.

Precisely covering this case.

An amendment for an enlargement of a general service of the Government is not in order under the clause relating to the continuation of a public work or object.

That exactly fits this case.

On page 353, Mr. Chairman, under the head of "Changing existing law:"

The enactment of positive law where none exists is a change of existing law.

And at the bottom of the same page I call the gentleman's attention to this statement, for this covers the whole ground:

An appropriation for an object in an annual appropriation bill makes law only for that year and does not become existing law to justify a continuance of the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, that exactly fits this case. I will call the gentleman's attention to a precedent: Four or five years ago an appropriation was put in authorizing the appointment of an international commission and carrying an appropriation of $100,000. No point of order was made against it on that year. It was renewed the second year, and the point of order was made and sustained that there was no authorization, the only thing being an appropriation made the preceding year. I do not care if you can trace this appropriation back to the time of Adam, unless you can find an authorization for the first one and for each succeeding one it can not stand against a point of order that there is no authorization.

Now, the gentleman cited certain references as to the experience of the Government in years gone by. I admit them all and that the law—existing law—authorizes the use of the profit fund from minor coinage in distributing that class of money and the use of the profit fund from the coinage of silver for distributing that. Those authorizations stand unchanged. But this is simply an item inserted from time to time, providing only for the year and the amount for which it is passed, and we shall only be doing over again what we did last year if we appropriate now $10,000 for additional work. The amount of $3,500 or $3,600 carried in this bill reported by the committee is in accordance with existing law. But this amount for future work is not authorized by any law on the statute book of the United States, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, this is an important matter, and I would like very much to answer the gentleman. If the last statement of the gentleman is true absolutely, and I am not certain but that it is, the amendment is clearly in order, because he says there is a law that now authorizes the Government to pay for subsidiary coin. If that is so, this applies to that. But, Mr. Chairman, let me say further: The gentleman says there is no existing law, and he reads from the act that I read from. I want to read the first paragraph of the sundry civil bill passed March 3, 1905.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has that provision before him.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, if the Chair is ready to rule in my favor, I do not want to take the time. [Laughter.] But I want to call the attention of the Chair to another proposition. The gentleman read one on page 353 of the Rules and Manual, and he says it is subject to his point of order, because this is found:

The enactment of positive law where none exists is a change of existing law within the meaning of the rule.

But under this provision in the sundry civil bill, which says that this is an appropriation for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, the Secretary of the Treasury wants $10,000 to help him through under existing law for the purpose of carrying this out, and therefore it does not change existing law, but continues existing law exactly as before. Now, this other clause I want to urge for fear the gentleman from Connecticut did not read it carefully or think about it himself:

An appropriation for an object in the annual appropriation bill makes law only for that year, and does not become existing law to justify the continuance of an appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we were dealing with any other fiscal year than the one ending June 30, 1906, then he would be right; but as we are not, but dealing with the present fiscal year and the present law carrying out the present existing conditions, that point of order must fail.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the whole matter can be encompassed in two or three words. On March 3, 1905, we passed an appropriation bill for $120,000 for the transportation of silver coin from the subtreasuries to the banks on their demand, they returning other money in lieu of it. Now, then, that measure is good until June 30, 1906. It is an incomplete measure until 1906. Before the Appropriations Committee came an estimate for $10,000 additional to execute that mandate of Congress that lasted until June 30, 1906, and the committee turned it down, and this proposition is to take that estimated deficiency and execute that law and make it complete to June 30, 1906, and that is all there is in this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The question presented is somewhat new, and has been argued, it seems to the Chair, with considerable ingeniousness and force by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and stated with very great clearness a moment ago by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. Whether the provision in the sundry civil act of March 3, 1905, would have been obnoxious to the rule had the rule been invoked at the time it is not necessary now to say. So far as anything which has been presented to the Chair is concerned, it would seem that that would have been ruled out had the point been made, but the point was not made, and the provision in the sundry civil act is the law until the 1st of July, 1906. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is to a bill which provides for making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, so that it does seem to the Chair that that is an appropriation asked for to carry out the provisions of the law which will be in effect until June 30, 1906. Of course, had the provision been made on the sundry civil bill to apply to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, there would be no question about its being out of order, so far as appears from anything here presented; but presented as an amendment to the deficiency bill for the year ending June 30, 1906, it seems to the Chair that the amendment is in order, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was taken up and we were about to commence the consideration of it I called attention to this part of the bill and asked to have an arrangement made by which, during the consideration of the bill by clauses under the five-minute rule, we were to have time enough to carefully discuss it. So, Mr. Chairman, in view of what was then said and agreed to, I ask that the measure may be discussed and time allotted to the discussion—not to me alone—for one hour. That will be in pursuance of the suggestion which was made on yesterday morning. It is one of the most important matters that have appeared here for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he be given one hour to discuss this——

Mr. KEIFER. No; that there be given to the discussion of it one hour. I would not ask for the hour myself.

The CHAIRMAN. To be controlled or divided in what way?

Mr. KEIFER. Half on one side and half on the other.

The CHAIRMAN. That is under the control of the Chair. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that there be devoted to the discussion of this provision and amendment one hour, the division of the time to be in the control of the Chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, is it competent in the Committee of the Whole to provide by unanimous consent for general debate on any proposition? It would be, undoubtedly, competent for the Committee of the Whole to give to the gentleman from Ohio as much time as that committee may desire to give.

The CHAIRMAN. It is competent for the committee to fix the time for discussing any special provision of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. My reason for asking the question is this: There is another very important provision in this bill and I desire to know whether it is within the power of the Committee of the Whole to do this.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of the mandate made by the House before going into the Committee of the Whole, it is competent for the committee to make such a rule as the gentleman now asks to have made by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEIFER. And it is only carrying out what the House agreed to before we went into committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. KEIFER. And let it be clearly understood that I am not asking for an hour for myself, but for half an hour on one side and half an hour on the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again put the request. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that there be given to the discussion of this section and the amendment offered by him one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask whether that is to be under the five-minute rule?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to modify his request so that there will be half an hour on each side. Let him control half an hour and let the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] control half an hour.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, no; let the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], a member of the committee, control half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then state the request as the Chair now understands it—that there be given one hour to the discussion of this subject, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and the other by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection to that request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, this matter is of grave importance to the country. In the first place, let me say that it is always unwise to put into an appropriation bill at all a clause that is to change any well-settled law of the land, and it is especially dangerous to do it on an appropriation bill when it may slip through quietly and leave harm to result. The bill itself does not disclose its object. It is an awfully innocent looking measure, but it is quiet and still on the subject of paying the transportation of silver coins of the United States from the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States to banks or corporations or individuals that may desire to have it. It has been the policy of this Government to do that with reference to silver coin, and especially subsidiary silver coin, ever since we have had any considerable amount in the United States. It has already been stated that in 1878, after the act of February 28, 1878, went into effect, that the Secretary of the Treasury then interpreted the law to be such as to authorize him to issue a circular to the Treasurer and subtreasuries of the United States directing them to send out the silver coin to whomsoever might desire it at the cost of the Government; but let us see a little about what is to be its effect. If we did not do this, we would contract the circulating medium of this country. First, the silver dollars and next, and perhaps still more important, the subsidiary silver coin.

We have in this country issues of silver dollars under the acts of 1878 and 1890, $578,303,848. The seigniorage arising as a benefit to the Government under the act of 1878 was $69,887,532.29, and under the act of 1890 was $64,277,453.71, a total of $134,164,898. That was what the Government made in the matter of coinage under those two acts. Now, in addition to that—I can not give the figures; it is not necessary—we have now of subsidiary silver coins $105,539,966, on which the seigniorage was proportionately very much larger, so that we may safely say that the seigniorage to the Government has reached substantially $200,000,000. It is objected that paying the cost of transporting silver coin is an unnecessary expense to continue. It has always been the policy to pay this cost out of the seigniorage. Now, let us see. Of this large amount of silver coins, over $578,000,000 under the two acts, we have in circulation outside of the Treasury of the United States of silver dollars generally about eighty millions. Looking to the report I could give the exact figures, but we have about eighty millions on an average. It runs down in midsummer to about $70,000,000 and up to the highest point of about $80,000,000. Assuming that we have that much now, we have in circulation of these silver dollars about $1 to every inhabitant of the United States, and we have cribbed up in the treasuries of the United States six dollars and a little more for every inhabitant of the United States, so following the past as a guide we are keeping circulated in this country about eighty millions of our silver dollars, and we are keeping circulated in this country also about $100,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin. By that I mean the half-dollars, quarters, and 10-cent pieces, not including the nickels and 1-cent pieces that do not come in it.

Now, gentlemen say that the banks get the advantage of this. That is not true. The banks do not get any advantage of it in a general way. It is the people who get the benefit of it. Any individual in the United States, ever since the act of 1878, at least, has had the right to send and get all the silver dollars he pleased. Some men say there is an objection that this runs in the interest of the express companies that carry for the United States. If you will repeal the law or fail to enforce the law, you allow the express companies to charge the individual and the companies just about four times as much for the same amount of silver that is sent out under the Government, so they will profit that much more if silver is continued to be shipped, which I doubt. It is a bad execution of the law that they complain of rather than of the law. That is not fair at all. Some of them give an instance and say the contract they made with the express companies was not carried out so as to work fairly. Then make a good contract and not strike down a good law. But here is the situation. It is inequitable. I take my own State to begin with. The bankers and individuals in the city of Cincinnati could get all the silver they want for nothing by calling for it.

The bankers and individuals in the city of Cleveland, in the city of Toledo, in the city of Dayton, in the city of Columbus, in the city of Springfield, and other places, if we fail to carry out this law, will have to pay expressage on their silver to get on a par with their brethren in the city of Cincinnati. The city of Cleveland has probably a million silver dollars and will want more. They can only get more by paying expressage for it. Pittsburg is in the same situation. I presume Pittsburg gets its silver dollars from Philadelphia, so they would have to pay the expressage from Philadelphia, and Philadelphia bankers, like New York bankers, can go to the subtreasury and get it for nothing.

Now, this matter of distributing the money is another proposition. You go into the Northwest, to St. Paul or Minneapolis, in Minnesota, and to banks farther west, extending out, if you please, to near the Pacific Ocean, and they must send to Chicago to get the silver dollars which their people use, and pay for expressing it, if we fail to carry out the laws existing ever since we have had any silver dollars worth shipping anywhere.

So you go into the southern country. The people down there like it, people that work in the fields, in agriculture—the hands prefer a silver dollar, because they can keep it cleaner and better. You go into the mines of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, and the miner wants silver and is paid in silver. Many a time they pay fifty thousand and sixty thousand dollars out in silver on one pay roll, but you require the people who pay it to pay their own expressage on it, and so on. I need not run this out. You will be able to understand this quite satisfactorily without my elaborating. But the friends of this measure say, "We will issue silver certificates in lieu of it." We are economists now and we will not expend this $10,000 for the balance of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, because of that fact. It is easy of demonstration, Mr. Chairman, that if you do not appropriate this $10,000 to carry out existing law you ought to get up a deficiency bill at once and call it "an urgent deficiency bill providing an appropriation of $300,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to issue sixty or seventy million dollars more of silver certificates." You will want every dollar of it. They will cost about $5,000 to every million dollars issued, which will be required if you leave this amendment out. You will want another deficiency appropriation bill, and mighty quick.

Now, gentlemen say that we have the silver certificates; but we have not. Five million forty-three thousand six hundred and three dollars in silver certificates are in the Treasury of the United States, but they are needed for purposes of exchange in keeping out the amount of silver certificates that have already been issued. So you must commence running the printing presses. You must buy sheets. You must get more employees up there. You must start in this new work in order that you may save the little sum of $10,000 here, and expend at least $300,000 more in order to carry it out, or contract the circulating medium at once to the extent that the people would not submit to expressing, at their own expense, the Government money out to the places where it is needed from time to time. This is a process that goes on all the time. It has cost about $130,000 a year to transport this silver money for a number of years, and it is likely to continue. But gentlemen, in their economy, want to stop it, so that it will not go out, and we will have a contraction of the money in circulation in the country, or we must spend $300,000 to avoid it, and get silver certificates for a large part of it.

Now, another proposition, Mr. Chairman. If we had the silver certificates printed and substituted, and we discredited our silver money and put it all in the Treasury, it would cost more annually to keep the silver certificates in circulation and redeem and change and reissue the mutilated and worn-out and destroyed money than it would cost to pay this transportation of silver coin to the people who want it. We are not dealing with the question of economy; we are dealing with a question that is to give some portions of the country an advantage over others. If they do not like silver in New York or Philadelphia or Cincinnati, or where they have subtreasuries and can get it easily, they do like it out on the plains, they like it in Texas, they like it out in the mountains among the miners, they like it among the southern people generally—I think I know—and my people like it. The workmen in the shops—and we have many of them in the city of Springfield, Ohio—almost always prefer to be paid on pay day with some silver.

Mr. KAHN. We have nothing but silver out in California.

Mr. KEIFER. And my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] says they have nothing but silver out there. Those who live around the subtreasury can get it easily, but if you get out at one or the other end of that great State they would have to send it out by private express companies, and so on. So you see somebody would have the advantage, and there is no reason for it. But the main question, Mr. Chairman, the great question, the grave one, is whether this great Government of the United States shall discredit its own money, $578,000,000 and more. Shall we do it?

Whether it was wise or not to coin silver there is no occasion to stop now and discuss. I believe it was wisely done. I believe that silver filled its office and will fill it in the future. I voted for, and have never changed my mind on, the silver act of 1878, and have been persistently against the free coinage of silver all my public life; and we have given under the act of 1878 and the act of 1890 this large sum of money. We should send it out wherever we can and credit it as far as we can.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman pardon a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman claim that it discredits the gold dollar because the Government does not transport it free of cost all over the United States?

Mr. KEIFER. It is the standard of money, and there is a large part of that in the banks and in the Treasury—a very large part of it—and it does not discredit it, because it is not the common people's money at all.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then why not let the silver certificate that stands behind the silver dollar be transported free of charge? Why not let the gold dollar and the gold certificate and the Treasury note and the greenback all be transported free of charge?

Mr. KEIFER. When the gentleman gets over his great interest in economy about this item and wants to carry all the money of this country free, let us appropriate money enough to carry it free to the people who call for it, and then I may join him. [Loud applause.]

I am not so sure that I could join with him, but if he will wait for an answer until we get to it I will answer that when we come to it. It is sufficient now to know that we are dealing with silver money and the contraction of the money. I did not finish the point I was making; because if you do not carry the subsidiary silver coin to the people of this country, you will be placed where they can hardly get along without it. There are $105,000,000 of it. It has always been carried free. My friend agrees to that. Now, we propose on an urgent deficiency bill to cease to carry it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman really mean what he says?

Mr. KEIFER. Assuredly, I mean it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does he not know, whether we pass this appropriation bill or not, the subsidiary coins will be distributed by the Government throughout the United States?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly they will, but it will be paid for at individual expense.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is mistaken. This provision is exactly like the provision in the sundry civil appropriation bill passed on March 3, 1905, and we include the expense of carrying subsidiary silver. Now it is proposed to carry none of it, not one single standard silver dollar nor subsidiary silver dollars. If I had time I would like to ask him where there is to be a dollar of money that is to carry the subsidiary silver after the present appropriation of $120,000 is exhausted.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Under the law—under the silver profit fund.

Mr. KEIFER. There is no such law. The law I have referred to and read expressly appropriated $120,000 to carry all kinds of silver coin, and we are short $10,000 for this fiscal year—short that amount for carrying the silver coins. There is no such law as the gentleman speaks of, and if there is we have been ignoring it all along the line. Look at the amendment. Look at the last sundry civil bill, and you will find the provision for carrying the subsidiary silver coin in both in the same words precisely. It seems to me that this is the most extraordinary legislation ever proposed. We are simply here for the purpose of carrying out existing law when we are dealing with an appropriation bill like this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, when the coinage of the standard silver dollar was authorized by the so-called "Bland-Allison Act" of 1878 the only provision relative to the issuance of silver certificates was that the holder thereof might deposit 1,000 silver dollars or any multiple thereof and receive silver certificates in denominations of $10 and upward therefor. There was then no provision that the United States Government might issue silver certificates upon the stock of silver coins in the Treasury of and belonging to the United States. This law required peremptorily that the Secretary of the Treasury take from two to four million dollars out of the Treasury of the United States and invest it in bullion and coin that bullion into standard silver dollars. It made no specific provision as to how those standard silver dollars were to be put into circulation among the people of the United States; and no sooner was the coinage of them entered upon than these dollars commenced to pile up in the Treasury, consuming the revenues of the country in the purchase of bullion and involving in a way the business of the Government.

Under these circumstances, in September, 1878, the Secretary of the Treasury announced the policy of shipping these coins to all parts of this country in exchange for any other form of currency, at the expense of the Government. That, in place of dignifying silver, put the badge of disgrace upon the standard silver dollar. It said that the Government of the United States was willing to pay the express charges to anyone within the limits of the United States who would consent to take these standard silver dollars and turn over to the Treasury any form of money known to the laws of the United States; and now it is solemnly insisted that if we remove that provision, if we say that the standard silver dollar is just as good as any other money issued by the United States Government, and we are unwilling to pay anybody anything to exchange other forms of money for the standard silver dollar, that that is putting the badge of degradation upon the standard silver dollar.

Mr. KEIFER. You are the only man who has said that so far.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is insisted that it is degrading the standard silver dollar to change this rule, when in point of fact it is dignifying the standard silver dollar to say that the United States regards every form of United States money as of equal value and will pay nothing to anybody to exchange one form for another form that may be in the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield a moment? I am very glad to hear the gentleman defending the silver dollar, but I meant to ask him this: Did the fathers who passed the act of 1795 place copper in the same predicament, including the cent, the nickel, and fractional coin in later years?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not going back to the fathers at all. I am going back to the act of 1878, and no farther.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will go back farther when the opportunity is presented.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Shortly after this policy was promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, of paying these express charges upon standard silver dollars in September, 1880, the Treasury Department determined by construction that it had the right to issue silver certificates upon the coin in the Treasury belonging to the Government of the United States, and from that day to this there has been no substantial trouble in making the silver in the Treasury substantially and practically available. But what have we succeeded in doing in all these years? We paid the express charges to send out from the Treasury more than 730,000,000 of standard silver dollars, and we have usually outstanding about 10 per cent of that, or $73,000,000. We have paid the express charges on ten times as many standard silver dollars as we are able to keep in circulation. It is a very nice thing for the express companies, and it is a nice thing perhaps for some other people. It is a nice thing perhaps for an eastern bank, when it wants to ship money into the West to move the crops, in place of paying the express charges itself, to deposit the money in a subtreasury and compel the United States to pay the expense of that transportation. The record will show that of the $44,000,000 shipped last year by the Treasury $27,000,000 were shipped in the five months when we were moving the crops of this country. Talk about graft! The whole system of paying these express charges for the privilege of exchanging one form of our money for another form of our money is nothing but graft in the interest of the express companies and of the bankers who want to transmit money into the West and South. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Unadulterated graft, too.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that the fault is in the administration of the law and not in the law itself?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The law could not be administered so as to free it from this evil. Why should the Government of the United States stamp the standard silver dollar and declare it to be as good as any other dollar on earth, and then pay somebody something to exchange some other money for the standard silver dollar?

Mr. BURLESON. In order to put different localities upon the same footing with places that have subtreasuries; that is why.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Why does this money come back if the people want it? Why do we have to pay the express charges on ten times as many standard silver dollars as are in circulation? We have to pay it because these gentlemen find it a profitable industry to ship this money out at Government expense and put it back in the Treasury at some subtreasury. The system was initiated when the Government wanted to realize on these standard silver dollars, and it may have been justifiable then. To-day the Government has no interest as to whether its balance in the Treasury be in standard silver dollars or in silver certificates or in gold certificates or in gold or in greenbacks, because under this Republican Administration every dollar of whatsoever kind is just as good as any other dollar, both to the Government and to everybody else, and there is no reason for paying a subsidy to get rid of any part of it. [Applause.] This is simply a proposition to vote a subsidy.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. To the express companies.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. A subsidy of $120,000 a year forever, in order that the express companies and those who want to transport the money at somebody else's expense besides their own may have the transportation paid out of the revenues of the Government and the moneys of the people in place of paying for it themselves. That is all there is in this question.

It is said that this will act to contract the currency. How can it contract the currency? What difference does it make whether the silver dollars are in the Treasury or whether somebody brings some other Government money and puts it into the Treasury and takes the silver dollars out instead, and in what way does that contract the currency?

Mr. KEIFER. Under what law would you issue paper currency or subsidiary coin?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This law does not apply to subsidiary coin.

Mr. KEIFER. It does expressly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It covers it, but subsidiary coin is otherwise covered. The subsidiary coin does not come back anyway into the Treasury. The subsidiary coin stays in circulation, but on this coin we have paid ten times over on all that we have kept in circulation.

Mr. KEIFER. If the subsidiary coin does not come back——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This proposition is for the Government to practically declare the silver dollar at a discount, and that it will pay somebody to give it other money in exchange for silver. It has been strenuously contended, and I think truly, that the abolition of this practice would result in the silver staying in circulation. It is, in my judgment, a fixed and settled purpose on the part of some people to ship this money back to the subtreasuries in order to loot the Treasury for the transportation of this money back again. And when you have once suppressed this infamous system, the money will stay in circulation in place of coming back. At any rate, we have got enough money appropriated to last until within a few days of the end of the fiscal year. Let us try for a few days and see whether, when we have done away with this system of graft, this money will not stay in circulation in place of our paying large sums of money every year to send it out again. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield such time as I have left, or as he may desire, to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, there is no question here of contraction of the currency; nor is there any question of the quality of money or anything of that kind. It is nothing more or less than precisely what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has characterized in plain, good, English language—unadulterated graft. That is all there is of it.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio some time ago said that he understood the Treasury Department recommended the continuance of this system. I make the broad statement that from John G. Carlisle down—and I have Mr. Carlisle's letter here, and if I had time I should be glad to use it—they want this discontinued. It is simply kept in this bill by the power of the express companies of the United States. It is unadulterated graft.

Let me read what the Treasurer of the United States says in regard to it:

> For the past two or three years the accumulation of silver dollars in the Treasury has been in excess of the amount that could have been disposed of in the regular transaction of the Treasury office, and it is submitted that under this condition it will be an unnecessary burden upon the Government to continue the shipment of silver dollars free of expense for transportation charges to depositaries.

That is from page 30 of the Treasurer's last report.

Again:

> The amount in circulation in January was $73,500,000, and from the changes observed in the past six years it is estimated that the maximum circulation has been reached. The annual movement of these dollars under present regulations entails great expenses, not only for transportation, but for labor in accounting, bagging, handling, and by constant and repeated movement wear and tear is produced and the result that it will ultimately require an additional expense to make good the loss by abrasion.

Gentlemen, I said it was unadulterated graft. I could show to this House—if I had a few minutes' time—where, under the operation of this law a few years ago, an express company in the United States got more than $16,000 for the transportation of its own money from San Francisco to New York, and the Government was powerless to help itself.

Let me read you a letter that I read to the House five years ago from Mr. Roberts in regard to this matter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE TREASURER,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1901.

SIR: In reply to the inquiries contained in your letter of February 2, you are informed:

1. The average price per thousand dollars paid for the transportation of silver coin from the Treasury offices to depositors, under the provisions of the annual appropriations acts, is shown on page 168 of the report of the Treasurer of the United States for 1900. It was $2.25 per $1,000 in 1900.

2. The highest price paid by the Government for the transportation of silver coin is to locations west of the one hundredth meridian. The charges also increase on shipments westward of the Missouri River from the fact that the Government has no contract with Wells, Fargo & Co. for such deliveries. Consequently there have been paid in many instances the sums of from $9 to $16 per thousand for such transportation.

3. The records of the Department show several instances in which standard silver dollars shipped from the Treasury, free of cost for transportation, have been returned to the Treasury in the same bags and with the seals intact as shipped. In one instance these shipments were regularly made to a port of entry, and the coins soon found their way back to point of shipment through the collector of customs, who received them in payments of import duties and then shipped them to the subtreasury office. As the bank in this instance was a "depository of the United States," the Department, as soon as the facts became known, took steps to prevent the further abuse of the privilege, and the practice was discontinued.

Application has been made for the shipment of silver coin to Honolulu. The rate asked from San Francisco is, on sums of $10,000 or over, $5.25 per thousand, and for smaller amounts, $6.75 per thousand. However, the Department has declined to accept these rates.

Under a contract with the steamship lines the collector of customs at Honolulu ships to San Francisco such silver coin as he receives at three-eighths per cent freight and one-tenth per cent for insurance.

Respectfully,

ELLIS H. ROBERTS,
Treasurer of the United States.

Hon. E. J. HILL, House of Representatives.

Let me make one more statement. It is entirely possible for any man in any part of this country who wants to pay customs dues in legal-tender money to send a draft to a subtreasury, and, whether the Government wishes to do it or not, compel the free shipment of silver to that point; and then, when that money has performed but the one work of paying duties on a single importation, the Government, by another law, is compelled, at its own expense, to transport that same money back to the subtreasury again; and I can show the gentleman where that has been done at a cost of $7.50 a thousand, and the Treasury Department is helpless under this free-transportation act. That is not all. It was all right when Mr. Sherman, in 1878, found the silver dollars were not going out promptly to issue a circular and say they should be sent free. Perhaps it was all right, if it could have been kept free from the abuses which have grown up around it, to continue the free transportation while we were continuing the coinage of silver, but the coinage of silver has stopped. Now, I am a banking man; I believe in banks, but I believe in them to the extent that I would stop them from stealing when I could, and the only advantage that can come to anybody under this law to-day is to enable the banks to deal unfairly with each other in this matter and to enable people to have silver transported at the expense of the Government. It won't make one penny's difference as to the circulation of the silver—not one penny. We have paid at the rate of $2 a thousand for transporting $750,000,000 since this coinage——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman want to retire the silver dollar entirely?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, that is another question. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that I have always been in favor of three things—subsidiary silver coin, all that the country would take; gold and gold certificates as the sole legal tender, and bank notes as the instruments of trade. That is my plank on the money question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That, in effect, retires the silver dollar entirely——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Not at all. I would make it a subsidiary coin, as Germany does.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wait a minute. The gentleman would turn the American people over to the banks, and yet he stands here making out the bankers of this country to be a lot of pirates that are pillaging the Treasury.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have in mind now where about 700 banks in New England agreed to pay checks at sight without exchange. Thirty-four banks in New England refused to do that. It was a simple proposition the 700 banks said. "Oh," they said, "we believe the system is right, and we will forward checks on these 34 banks by Adams Express Company for collection." They did it, and what do you suppose the 30 banks did? Availed themselves of the privilege of this law and shipped silver at the expense of the Government from the subtreasury at Boston and refused to pay any other kind of money in satisfaction of those checks except those silver dollars and punished every bank in New England in that way under the terms of this law, and it is being used more to-day for that purpose than for any other.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman read just now what Mr. Treat says. He is in favor of this. He is also in favor of not using any money to transport the other silver coin.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, so far as the other silver coin is concerned, I understand the result to be just this: If the appropriation is not passed, the pennies, under the old law, from the time they were first coined will be delivered to anybody that wants them and the cost of transportation charged to the profit fund, or the fund that arises from the seigniorage in the coinage of them.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the nickels.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And the nickels also. The subsidiary coin is also transported out of the profit which comes from the seigniorage to ten different subtreasuries in the United States, from Boston to San Francisco, and that will continue just the same. It is only this question of transporting the silver dollar that is involved in this proposition.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman does not mean to repeat that statement, because for every year for thirty years the appropriation has been exactly in a lump sum for the carrying of silver dollars and subsidiary silver coin. The gentleman is right about the nickel and the copper, but as to the other he is absolutely wrong, and he voted, I assume, in the last Congress——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, I will refer the gentleman to the testimony taken before his own committee, the letter of Mr. Roberts, and also to the statutes right straight through. The difference between the gentleman and myself is this: I say that under the law as it stands, and as it has stood ever since 1853, the subsidiary silver coin will be transported at the expense of the Government to the various treasuries and subtreasuries of the United States and the cost of that transportation taken out of the profit fund.

It will not be carried on the order of an individual anywhere that he chooses to have it sent at the expense of the United States, but the distribution that always occurred will continue under the provisions of the laws as they stand without the passage of this appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. You are utterly mistaken.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman has charged that this is a graft pure and simple——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In my judgment.

Mr. BURLESON (continuing). I will not take issue with you upon that proposition, and I do not doubt the truthfulness of your charge, that there has been graft—administering this law, but I want to ask you this question: If this policy of the Government is now abandoned will it not place every section of the United States which has not a subtreasury at a disadvantage with the points that have subtreasuries, and will not there be an increased pressure at once for the establishment of subtreasuries all over the United States?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, I do not think so at all. I think this will be the result——

Mr. BURLESON. If you do not think so, why not?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Because the distribution is so general. As the gentleman himself understands, at the time this law was originally passed we did not have facilities for distribution which we now have. Pennies were only made in Philadelphia——

Mr. BURLESON. I am not talking about pennies; I am talking about standard silver dollars. Any banker who wants standard silver dollars for the accommodation of his customers now in New York, Boston, or Philadelphia, or wherever there is a subtreasury, can go and get them without any expense, but banks in the far West——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I must insist I shall have my two minutes to myself. I shall repeat again, there was not, from the time of John G. Carlisle until now, a Treasury official who did not think this law was susceptible of vicious uses, but the Treasury Department has always been unable to prevent these irregular practices under it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has Secretary Shaw asked you to knock this appropriation out?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. No; he has not. This House has voted it out heretofore.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But it was put back elsewhere.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have whipped you every time you undertook——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In 1901 or a subsequent year this House voted it out, but it was put back elsewhere.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It was voted out in the committee; there is your speech, fourteen columns long.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, Mr. Chairman, absolutely no harm can come to anybody by not making this appropriation, and you will be discontinuing this vicious practice and make a far more satisfactory condition of things. Since this free transportation was inaugurated a great change has come over the fiscal affairs of the United States in this respect. Now we have three mints, one at Philadelphia, one at Denver, and one in California, and the Government through these has full power to distribute its money in all the different sections of the country. A refusal to make this appropriation takes away the power of any individual in the United States to hold up the Treasury Department and compel them to carry money free of charge around the country. It does not increase the circulation; it does not decrease the circulation. We have distributed 750,000,000 of these silver dollars at a cost of more than a million and a half of dollars, and yet to-day out of that $750,000,000 only $73,000,000 are in circulation, and the Treasurer of the United States himself says that the aggregate circulation has probably been reached. It is an opportunity for you to save $120,000 a year that does nobody any honest good, and it does the Treasury just $120,000 worth of harm, and if you want to vote for this amendment you will vote one-twelfth of this unjust and unfair and improper appropriation. That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to consume the balance of his time?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We would like for you to consume it now.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion is a reasonable one on the part of the gentleman from Iowa. I believe I have ten minutes' time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not reckon anybody is going to ship money from one place to another, whether the money be gold or silver, just because they can ship it without paying express charges. That strikes me as the first proposition in this discussion, and if, as the gentleman from Connecticut says, it be true that if this law were repealed a man could still force the subtreasuries to send money at the expense of the Government, then I do not see why he objects to its being repealed. That is the second.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say that an individual order could ship the money if this appropriation were not made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You said there was some method, which you described, for making the subtreasury send the money at its expense. The RECORD will show what the gentleman said.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a plain, common-sense, business proposition. It has not anything to do with the old silver and gold discussion at all. Silver is one of our forms of money, and it just happens to be the heaviest money in proportion to its value that we have—that is, the heaviest in the matter of weight. As a consequence, it is the most expensive money to ship from one place to another, and because of that and because of the desire to distribute the silver money of the country from around the centers where the subtreasuries are, to the cotton fields and the wheat fields, where it is needed in the States, where there are no subtreasuries, this law got upon the statute book. And the reason for putting it upon the statute book is the reason for keeping it upon the statute book.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can only speak with perfect knowledge of my own country. Every fall, when the cotton picking begins, immense amounts of silver money are sent into the South, not silver dollars altogether, as the gentleman seems to think—altogether or chiefly—but dimes and quarters and halves. And the darky who works upon the plantation—chiefly in the cotton field as a cotton picker—does not want paper money even if you could give it to him. The fact mentioned by the gentleman to the effect that this law was first passed before there were small paper notes of $2 cuts no figure in the case, because what is needed in the cotton fields chiefly is the dime or the quarter or the half, and after that the dollar. The man who does the cotton picking is suspicious of the paper money. He is not in the habit of dealing with it.

The gentleman seems to be ignorant of the fact that throughout the South, at any rate, and much of the West, the only money that floats less than a five-dollar bill is silver, and the ignorant man who can not read—and most of the darkies are unfortunately yet in that class—know a silver dollar when they see it and feel it, but they do not know a one-dollar paper bill from a two-dollar paper bill, a great many of them. They prefer the silver money, and silver money is sent there to pay the cotton pickers every year, as well as to pay the wage hands in the sawmills and in the lumber yards. It will be a serious damage to the cotton country if this movement should be stopped or restricted, and it would be to some extent restricted, of course, if the banks, in sending to the centers for money to remove their crops, should receive other forms of money than silver; and they would send for other forms of money as much as they could if this law should be repealed, for it would cost them more to get the silver than to get the other forms of money. It is a plain business proposition, and there ought not to be any excitement about it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to close the debate on this, unless gentlemen want to occupy the remainder of their time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield one or two minutes of my time to the chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that this is a business proposition, and it was in that spirit that the subcommittee in the preparation of this bill took up the consideration of this deficiency appropriation of $10,000. In that investigation we discovered some facts with respect to abuses that have grown up under these annual appropriations. We also inquired into the necessity of continuing this appropriation and came to the conclusion almost unanimously, and the conclusion was clearly indicated in the hearing, that in all probability the subcommittee would not report favorably on this proposition. By some unknown means the representatives of the express companies were the first to receive the news of the probable action of the subcommittee, and members of the subcommittee were waited upon next morning by the representatives of the express companies, urging that this provision be continued. Inquiry developed the fact that the law is being abused, and as an illustration I cite this actual occurrence. A banker in Yonkers——

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the testimony is embodied in this hearing

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; it is not. That is, in respect to this abuse. We have the testimony from the chief clerk of the Treasury Department. In one instance a banker in Yonkers asked to have several thousand dollars—I do not remember now how many thousand silver dollars. He made his demand upon the subtreasury in the city of New York. From the city hall in New York to the city of Yonkers is 14 miles, as I am advised by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. That shipment was made by the express company from New York City to Binghamton, about 250 miles.

At Binghamton it was transferred to another express company, known as the "National," and sent to Tarrytown, a distance of about 250 miles, and then at Tarrytown it was transferred to another express company and shipped 15 miles into Yonkers. That is a practical illustration of one of the abuses that is practiced under this annual appropriation for the transportation of silver at the expense of the Government. In justice to the Department I should say that the United States Express Company has the contract for carrying silver, and that its express company does run direct from New York to Yonkers, as I am informed. It is in the hope of saving the public money that is now being expended illegally and extravagantly, and viciously, I might say, in the transportation of this particular class of money when all other classes of money must be transported at the expense of the individual citizen or bank desiring it that the committee has omitted this item in this bill. I am advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that private enterprises, private institutions, and corporations, such as department stores, send to the subtreasuries for the money to be used as an advertising medium in the transaction of their business.

The department stores will get it from the subtreasuries at the expense of the Government, and pay that money out to their customers as an inducement for them to continue their custom or their patronage. Abuses of all kinds are growing up; and I have reason to believe, Mr. Chairman, that these abuses are encouraged by the chief beneficiaries of the practice, the express companies. They reap the benefit of this free distribution of silver for which this annual appropriation of $130,000 is made.

It is the hope of putting a stop to this that the committee has omitted this particular item.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In that two minutes I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that it is not with the hope or design of preventing anybody in the United States from utilizing that particular coin or character of money to which he is accustomed, or which he desires to use, that this policy is advocated here to-day. I for one hope that every man in the United States will have every facility to get, at his own expense, not the expense of the Government of the United States, whatever kind of money best suits his individual taste. [Applause.] Our desire is simply this: The Government issues various kinds of money, and the public faith is pledged that these shall be of equal value, but when one who seeks for his own purposes to exchange the money that he has for another form of money he shall pay the necessary expense incident to the exchange. Already, even without this appropriation, the Government will bear a considerable proportion of the expense. The Government has to pay for the expense of the officer necessary to conduct these exchanges for the accommodation of the public, and no earthly reason can be assigned why the Government of the United States shall keep a man to exchange that silver for other currency of equal value and then pay tribute to the express companies of $130,000 annually for the purpose of carrying on that profitless business.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes I have I shall not attempt to answer the arguments based solely upon the fact that somebody in the Treasury has either been so knavish or so weak that they can not make a good contract with the express companies to prevent the Government from being injured. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I want, without putting my statement against the statement of gentlemen that this appropriation would have no effect upon the subsidiary silver coin, to read two or three lines from some of the testimony in the hearings before the subcommittee.

Mr. GRAFF asked this question:

Suppose this item here were changed so as to cut out of the transportation everything but the subsidiary coin—

Mr. LIVINGSTON interrupted and said:

And minor coin—

Mr. GRAFF continued his question—

Yes; and minor coin, and let the other be provided in another item. What would be the necessary change in the appropriation as to amount?

Mr. ROBERTS. You would not need to appropriate so much money.

Gentlemen have proclaimed here that they would get along without any, but the Director of the Mint did not agree with them. So much for that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can I direct the gentleman's attention to this?

Mr. KEIFER. I have not time to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You better look at it; it is on page 10.

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $15,000.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all right, too.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does Secretary Shaw say on the subject?

Mr. KEIFER. We have been told that this is a matter of "graft." I would like to know whether these men have gotten religion or good morals recently or not. [Laughter and applause.] They have been reporting, recommending, and voting for this "graft" here for all the years for the time they have been in Congress, and have suddenly discovered that they have not been doing that which is right.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. Did not the gentleman vote for the appropriation of last year?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not; it has been opposed by Mr. HILL and myself all the time.

Mr. KEIFER. You multiplied the amount of the amendment by 12, and put it into the act of March 3, 1905.

Now, it is an easy thing to talk down a matter that is carried in the bill by simply talking about where somebody had taken advantage of somebody else, and say that is an argument against a good law.

That is a thing we always hear when men find the exigencies of discussion drive them to it. There is nothing else in it. This has been the law always, and the Director of the Mint, in the same testimony before the same subcommittee, testified that this had been the law continuously since 1853. And John Sherman knew what he was about, for he was not so much of a silver man in 1878, but he was a man who believed in executing the laws of the land; and so, without waiting for Congress to vote a graft to him, he said such was the law of this country, and he issued his circular of September, 1878, saying that the silver dollars should be distributed to everybody in this country who asked for them at the expense of the Government.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment? He will admit that this was three years before this law was ever thought of.

Mr. KEIFER. It was after February 28, 1878, when we made the standard silver dollar in the act of that date. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JAMES) there were—ayes 74, noes 63.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SMITH of Iowa and Mr. KEIFER.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 74.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12320—the urgent deficiency bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 343. An act concerning a public building in Selma, Ala.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MRS. Z. RICHARDSON.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. HULL, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mrs. Z. Richardson, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill (H. R. 11485) to permit the owners of certain vessels and the owners or underwriters of cargoes laden thereon to sue the United States, and the bill (H. R. 11486) to authorize the maintenance of actions for an exigence causing death in maritime cases, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Judiciary. I have consulted the chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, and it is satisfactory to him. Evidently the reference was an inadvertence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CERTAIN LANDS IN UTAH.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 321) to provide for the extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence upon certain lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Utah if this bill has been reported favorably by a House committee?

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. It has been favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands unanimously.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of the House?

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Of the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it a bill similar to a House bill?

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. It is a Senate bill the provisions of which are identical with the House bill introduced on the same subject. The Senate bill having passed the Senate, the House committee, to expedite the matter, reported favorably the Senate bill.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand it, it simply extends the time.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. It extends the time in which settlers may establish their residence.

Mr. PAYNE. This is necessary because the settlement can not be made in the winter time?

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. The bill provides for an extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence on the unallotted lands of the Uinta Indian Reservation, which was opened to settlement late in the fall of 1905.

The right to enter and the order of precedence in entering these lands for the first sixty days after the same were subject to settlement was determined by lot, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Under these regulations the first filings were made on August 28, 1905, and filings of such persons so entitled to enter homesteads were made until October 28, 1905, when the lands not filed upon by those who had drawn a preferential right were generally subject to homestead entry. This section of the State is remote from railroads, and it was impossible for intending settlers to prepare sufficient shelter so late in the fall as would protect them from the rigors of the approaching winter, which, on account of the great altitude, is very severe. It is likewise impossible for them to establish homes within the six months after filing, as that would necessitate their going into that inhospitable country in the midst of a severe winter. The bill therefore extends the time to a reasonable season of the year, May 15, 1906, for complying with the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the homestead settlers on lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah, opened under the acts of May 27, 1902, and March 3, 1903, and March 3, 1905, be, and they are hereby, granted an extension of time in which to establish their residence upon the lands so opened and filed upon until the 15th day of May, A. D. 1906: Provided, however, That this act shall in no manner affect the regularity or validity of such filings, or any of them, so made by the said settlers on the lands aforesaid; and it is only intended hereby to extend the time for the establishment of such residence as herein provided, and the provisions of said acts are in no other manner to be affected or modified.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DAM IN COFFEE COUNTY, ALA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7085) authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Pea River Power Company, a corporation, be, and is hereby, authorized to erect, build, have, and maintain a steel and concrete dam, or dam of other material, on Pea River, at a point 4 miles below, or about 4 miles below, the town of Elba, in Coffee County, State of Alabama.

With the following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Provided, That the plans of said dam shall be submitted to and be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before construction is commenced; and the Secretary of War may at any time require and enforce, at the expense of the owners, such modifications in the construction of said dam as he may deem advisable in the interests of navigation: Provided further, That there shall be placed and maintained in connection with said dam a sluiceway so arranged as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass around, through, or over said dam without unreasonable delay or hindrance and without toll or charges; and suitable fishways, to be approved by the United States Fish Commission, shall be constructed and maintained on said dam.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the dam herein authorized is commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill (H. R. 12075) to exempt from internal-revenue tax domestic alcohol intended for lighting, heating, and manufacturing purposes, and for use as a motor fuel.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that on Monday I shall ask unanimous consent that the District business be taken up at the close of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and that the House proceed with the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill on Monday morning, after the reading of the Journal. I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior recommending the creation of the office of chief clerk of the Office of Indian Affairs—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of deficiency appropriation for additional clerical force in the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the Surgeon-General, a recommendation of legislation raising the general limit of cost of barracks and other permanent structures—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of State, requesting that certain persons be authorized to accept gifts and decorations presented to them by foreign governments—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Postmaster-General increasing the estimate of appropriation for mail bags, etc.—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. Mr. SMOOT. I present a petition of citizens of Arizona, favoring the annexation of the Arizona Strip to the State of Utah. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRYE. Under the rule the names of the petitioners will not be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; under the rule the names can not be printed.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens and taxpayers of the "Arizona Strip," do hereby petition Congress for annexation to the State of Utah. We make this petition for the following reasons:

By our geographical position we are separated from the judicial and political headquarters of Arizona. We are 250 miles from our county seat, thus making protection from the courts expensive and impracticable.

Our business and our social contact is necessarily with Utah; even our communication with Territorial officials must be made over Utah routes.

And especially in view of the prospective joint statehood of Arizona and New Mexico do we urge a favorable consideration. This jointure could only have the effect of increasing above-mentioned objections.

In conclusion we beg to acknowledge the courtesies extended us by Arizona. Still, in face of present prospective conditions do we stand for annexation to Utah.

Signed this 14th day of December, 1905, at Fredonia, Ariz.

NEEDS OF ALASKA.

Mr. PILES. In November last the 60,000 American residents in Alaska, represented by elected delegates, met in a territorial convention in the city of Seattle and chose three delegates to present to the President and Congress the needs of that section of the country. The convention also adopted a memorial, which I present, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Territories, as follows:

To the people, the Congress, and the President of the United States:

The 60,000 Americans resident in Alaska, represented by elected delegates in Territorial convention this 20th day of November, 1905, appeal to the American people in every State and Territory, and to Congress and the President of the United States, with a candid statement of Alaska's needs, and a respectful demand for the recognition of her rights.

That those needs may be clearly understood and those rights dealt with in justice, we deem it fitting to present an outline of conditions as they exist in Alaska to-day.

In the precious metals of gold, silver, and copper, and in deposits of coal, tin, and iron ore, we believe that Alaska is the world's richest storehouse. Its waters produce one-half of the annual salmon catch of the Western Hemisphere. Its 580,107 square miles exceed the combined areas of the Empires of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and the islands of Great Britain and Ireland.

The great mountain systems of Alaska are crowned with ice and snow, and they feed glaciers, but in the southern and central portions are vast and fertile valleys, some as large as the State of Ohio, densely timbered and yielding abundantly of grasses, all varieties of vegetables, and the hardy grains. These valleys correspond in area, latitude, and climatic conditions with portions of northwestern Europe which contain 16,000,000 of enlightened and prosperous people.

Within this wide expanse of territory 60,000 Americans, their numbers rapidly increasing, are engaged in developing resources of limitless extent and of incalculable benefit to the prosperity of the United States.

But their work is a struggle against adversity. They face not alone the physical disadvantages of a country alternating with rugged mountains and forest-covered valleys, but they are burdened with laws wholly unsuited to their needs, which breed expensive litigation, engender animosities, and frequently bring progress to a halt.

A heavy tax is imposed by Congress upon every character of Alaskan industry and but a fraction of it is applied to Alaska's welfare as the people of Alaska believe it should be applied.

The 60,000 Americans in Alaska represent the vigor and intelligence of young manhood from every State and Territory of the Union. They have carried with them to their new home the public school, the church, the hospital, the daily newspaper, the telephone, and the electric light. They have carried also to their new home the American love of liberty and the American belief that their local affairs can be regulated by themselves better than by a body of men, however enlightened, living in different environments and occupied with other duties many thousands of miles away.

Wherefore, we demand the application to Alaska of the fundamental American principle of self-government and elective representation in Congress. We ask no help or favors, but only to be permitted to work out our own destiny and do our share in contributing to the prosperity and welfare of our common country.

In addition, we present herewith Alaska's other immediate and most urgent needs:

First and foremost. A statute applying to Alaska alone, amendatory of and supplementary to the Federal statute on mines and mining, making it impossible to locate placer mining claims by agent or attorney in fact with or without power of attorney, or in any manner to locate such claims otherwise than in person; making it impossible to locate more than 20 acres of placer mining ground in one claim, thus abolishing the group-claim curse; making it impossible for any one person to locate more than two placer mining claims on any one creek, or on any one of its tributaries; declaring that the bona fide finding of gold in any quantity whatever anywhere within the boundaries of a placer mining claim constitutes discovery; substituting a cash assessment of $25 per annum on each placer mining claim for the annual labor asessment of $100 now required by law, with the penalty that failure to pay such cash assessment subjects the claim to relocation, the moneys so paid to be expended in the construction and maintenance of wagon roads and trails in Alaska, and, finally, declaring the law of water rights in connection with placer mining claims.

Second. A direct appropriation of $1,000,000 by Congress for the building of wagon roads and trails under the supervision of the Alaska Road Commission.

Third. The application of the earnings of the Government cable and telegraph system in Alaska to the betterment and extension of the cable, the land lines, and the wireless stations, and appropriations for necessary extensions of the cable.

Fourth. Legislation relieving United States judges in Alaska of administrative duties and the appointing of United States commissioners by transferring such duties to the governor or other civil officials.

Fifth. A redistricting of the present judicial divisions, an increase in the number of judges, and the creating of an appellate court in Alaska. That pending the creation of such appellate court appeals from Alaska be held in Seattle in lieu of San Francisco.

Sixth. The abolishing of the antiquated fee system in all offices and the substitution of adequate salaries.

Seventh. The removal of the restrictive tax of $100 per annum a mile on railroads in Alaska.

Eighth. The establishing of base lines and meridians in the vast and fertile valleys of southern and central Alaska to the end that homesteaders now located and locating there in large numbers may occupy and improve the public domains of Alaska on terms of equality with homesteaders on the public domains elsewhere in the United States.

Ninth. The providing of more light-houses on the coasts of Alaska, where a fleet of American steamers is engaged in the merchant marine exceeding in numbers the American fleet engaged in one field on any other ocean.

Tenth. Better postal facilities, with special reference to assistance for postmasters in rapidly growing towns.

Eleventh. The erection of suitable buildings for the transaction of public business in the several divisions of Alaska.

Twelfth. We favor placing the care and protection of the native of Alaska under the direct supervision of the governor, in accordance with the recommendation of the President in his annual message of 1904.

In conclusion, we appeal to the press of the United States for the just treatment which it accords, when rightly informed, to all deserving interests.

Respectfully submitted, with the unanimous indorsement of the committee on resolutions, November 20, 1905.

J. G. PRICE, Chairman.
J. J. BURNS, Secretary.

Approved by unanimous vote, November 20, 1905, by the convention.

A. P. SWINEFORD, President.
J. J. BURNS, Secretary.

This is to certify that the third Alaska Territorial convention, composed of delegates duly elected by the people of Alaska pursuant to regular call and assembled and in session at Seattle, Wash., from November 15 to 22, 1905, for the purpose of memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States with regard to the legislative needs of Alaska, have regularly elected A. P. Swineford, Richard S. Ryan, and Omar J. Humphrey as delegates and representatives of the people of Alaska to appear before the President and the Congress to urge the enactment of such legislation as is requested by memorial and resolutions duly made and attested and herewith transmitted through the above-named delegates.

A. P. SWINEFORD, Chairman.
J. J. BURNS, Acting Secretary.

He also (by request) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $9,500 for completing the surveys on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation in North Dakota, and for expenses in connection therewith in the office of the surveyor-general for North Dakota, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—THOMAS H. CARPENTER.

On motion of Mr. HANSBROUGH, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Thomas H. Carpenter, late captain and brevet major, United States Army, retired, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

REPORT ON THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Report No. 10, being the report from the Committee on Commerce on the so-called "shipping bill," is completely exhausted, and there are a great many calls for it. I ask that 5,000 copies may be printed for the use of the document room, adding one paper to it, "The Army's need of merchant steamships as transports in war." I ask that it be amended to that extent and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that 5,000 copies of Senate Report No. 10, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, Development of the American Merchant Marine and American Commerce, together with a certain appendix thereto, be printed.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 10, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, to accompany the bill S. 529 (Development of the American Merchant Marine and American Commerce), with additional matter as Appendix B, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION FOR PORTO RICO.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to take from the files of the Senate the original manuscript of the report of the commissioner of education for Porto Rico for the year ended June 30, 1905, and return the same to the Department of the Interior for the files of that Department, said report having been printed as Senate Document No. 60, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FE RAILROAD COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. LONG, it was Ordered, That 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 140, Fifty-ninth Congress, Departure from Published Rates by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, etc., be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE ON PUGET SOUND.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the bill (S. 954) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 3127. An act providing for the holding of Federal court at Grand Island, Nebr., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 5976. An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. R. 7085. An act authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CLAIMS OF STATE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that that bill may go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BOISE, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1365) providing for the placing of an elevator in the public building at Boise, Idaho.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. KEAN. I trust we shall be allowed to complete the morning business, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I ask what is the regular order of business at this time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The introduction of resolutions, concurrent and other, is now in order.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT POINT JUDITH, RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inform the Senate whether changed conditions necessitate a change of project for the main breakwater of the harbor of refuge at Point Judith, Rhode Island, and if so, to submit plans and estimates for such revised project.

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION, ETC.

Mr. WETMORE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the concurrent resolutions passed February 9, 1901, and May 10, 1902, providing for the publication of the Documentary History of the Constitution, and the Bulletins of the Bureau of Rolls and Library of the Department of State, are hereby continued in force, and excepted from the limitation of one year, as provided in section 80 of the act of January 12, 1895, for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution which I introduced some days since may be laid before the Senate and read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] on the 18th instant, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate there is a governmental power to fix minimum future charges of carriers by railroad, vested in the legislatures of the States with regard to transportation exclusively within the States, and vested in Congress with regard to all other transportation.

2. Although legislative power, properly speaking, can not be delegated, the lawmaking body having enacted into law the standard of charges which shall control, may intrust to an administrative body not exercising in the true sense judicial power the duty to fix rates in conformity with that standard.

3. It is the duty of Congress to provide by law that all interstate rates shall be reasonable and just, and then to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to ascertain what rates are reasonable and just, and to enforce its findings, this power to be exercised in reviewing rates already put in operation by the roads and on complaint.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 11, 1905, shows the following colloquy to have taken place on the floor of the Senate:

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Did I understand the Senator to say that Congress has the power to make rates and that Congress can not delegate that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. FORAKER. What I said was that a great many very excellent lawyers are of the opinion that Congress itself does not have the power to make specific rates. About that I will express no opinion. It may be they are in error. But what I said—and as to this I have no doubt whatever in my mind—was that Congress has no power to delegate to a commission, except in an administrative way, authority to make rates, because that is a delegation of legislative power pure and simple, and you can not find a rule in any of the books or in any of the decisions that will uphold it.

Mr. CLAY. I think I understand the Senator. The Senator, then, denies to Congress the power so to amend the interstate-commerce law as to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to hear complaints as to whether or not rates are unjust and unreasonable, and if it finds they are, to reduce them. The Senator contends that Congress can not delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission that power?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes. I contend that the delegation of legislative power—I am not undertaking to specify it, but as a general proposition—is prohibited.

Mr. CLAY. I also understand the Senator to say that at present the subject of rebates has been dealt with, and I agree with him.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. And so with discriminations. The long and short haul clause of the interstate-commerce act is practically a nullity now under the decisions of our courts, and I understand the Senator to contend that Congress can not go any further than we have gone so far as concerns giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to prescribe and fix rates.

Mr. FORAKER. I do. I am opposed to giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix rates as a matter of policy. I am opposed to it as a matter of power, except in a purely administrative way.

Mr. CLAY. I will say that I do not agree with the Senator from Ohio in the position he has taken.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I must have misunderstood the Senator from Ohio, but if I understood him correctly he asserts that when Congress confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix a reasonable rate in substitution for an unreasonable one it delegates to the Interstate Commerce Commission legislative power of Congress, and therefore it is not competent under the Constitution for Congress to pass that kind of a law. Did I understand the Senator to say that?

Mr. FORAKER. That is my opinion if the power be conferred in a legislative way without any qualification whatever, and I see it as plain as a pikestaff.

Mr. BAILEY. Then let me inquire: The Senator from Ohio does not believe that the same reasoning would apply to the commissions created in the several States, which have themselves been authorized not to substitute reasonable for unreasonable rates, but to initiate and fix the rates in the first instance?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, that is a different question, dependent upon the particular legislation and the power that is lodged in the legislative department of the particular State governments; and when the case is presented we will measure it. What I am referring to is the fact that we are authorized by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and here are a great many good lawyers who think that even Congress has no right to fix the price at which transportation shall be furnished any more than it has a right to fix the sum which the engineers and conductors and other employees of the railroad shall be paid for their services. A great many good lawyers so contend. I say upon that question I express no opinion, but I have been very greatly impressed with some of the arguments which have been made in behalf of that proposition. I have always supposed that under the power to regulate commerce we should have the power to fix rates, but since I have investigated the subject, as I have been trying to do during the past summer, that the Congress has no constitutional power to delegate to a commission the legislative authority to make specific rates.

Mr. President, the language of the Senator from Ohio is easily understood, and if the position taken by the Senator be a sound one in law, then Congress undoubtedly is without power to grant relief in any way whatever to American shippers.

I understood the Senator from Ohio to say, and it may be inferred from what the Senator said, that power was lodged in Congress to regulate interstate commerce and that Congress could pass a law, fixing in the law itself the rate to be charged, but could not give to the Commission the power to hear facts and fix reasonable and just rates.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I interrupt the Senator only to say that he has not correctly stated my view as expressed in the remarks to which he has referred. I did not concede that Congress has the power, even by direct enactment, to fix rates. I said that I was not prepared at that time to express an opinion, that there were many very eminent members of the legal profession who claimed—and with strong argument in support of the claim—that Congress itself had no power under the commerce clause of the Constitution to fix rates, but, assuming for the sake of argument that Congress had the power, my contention was that Congress could not delegate that power, but that in utilizing a commission it must give to it only administrative duties; that if it could confer the power it could be only given as an administrative power.

Mr. CLAY. I think I understood the Senator then, and I think I understand the Senator now. The Senator used this language, and I have the language before me and can not be mistaken about it. The Senator said he had always thought that under the clause giving to Congress the right to regulate interstate commerce, Congress had itself the right to fix rates. That was, I think, the exact language used by the Senator from Ohio; but I have the language before me——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will read another sentence, he will see that I qualified that in the way I have indicated.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator did say that a great many excellent lawyers did not agree with him in that opinion. The Senator said that he had always been of the opinion that this power existed. Of course the Senator may have investigated the question further and changed his views in regard to the matter.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not at this time find just where the Senator from Georgia is reading from the remarks I made on this matter, though I have the RECORD before me. Will the Senator tell me at what point I made the remarks which he has been quoting?

Mr. CLAY. I read from the first part of the remarks of the Senator. He spoke as follows:

> I have always supposed that under the power to regulate commerce we ourselves have the right to fix rates, but I have always been of opinion, and never so clearly as since I have investigated the subject, as I have been trying to do during the past summer, that the Congress has no constitutional power to delegate to a commission the legislative authority to make specific rates.

Those are the exact words of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; having reference to what I said earlier, which was—I will try to find it in just a moment——

Mr. CLAY. All right.

Mr. FORAKER. I can not put my eye on it just now, but I will state to the Senator that what I said was just at the very threshold of the discussion was the general question of whether Congress had the power to fix rates at all under the power to regulate commerce——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Ohio denying to Congress the right and power to provide that rates shall be reasonable and just and then to delegate to the Commission the power to find what rates are reasonable and just left the country in a very serious condition. If the Senator says that the power can not be delegated to the Commission and that Congress itself can not exercise that power, then the condition is much more serious.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CLAY. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator again, but I only wish to ask him a question at this point.

Mr. CLAY. Very well.

Mr. DANIEL. Has not the Supreme Court again and again decided this question?

Mr. CLAY. I think so; but I will again refer to this matter in my argument.

Mr. FORAKER. I could not hear what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] said.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Virginia asked me was it not true that time and again this question had been before the supreme courts of the States, and even before the Supreme Court of the United States, and I said I thought it had. I contend that the work performed by the Commission is purely administrative; but when Congress declares that the rates shall be reasonable and just that is the legislative will of Congress; and when Congress fixes the standard it is a question of fact as to what are reasonable and just rates, and this work can be performed by the Commission.

If Congress can not prescribe that interstate freight rates shall be reasonable, just, and impartial, and delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to hear facts and find out what rates are reasonable and just, so as to carry out the legislative will of Congress, then the railroads can fix rates, either just or unjust, and the American shippers will have nowhere to go to redress their wrongs and secure reasonable and just freight rates. We all know that it will be impossible for Congress to hear the thousands of complaints from citizens who are shippers throughout the length and breadth of the country, and determine what rates are reasonable and just, so as to grant proper and adequate relief to the people. Congress is a large body and could not possibly spare the time to hear these complaints and do justice to the railroads and to the people. In order to appreciate the magnitude of this task, it will be necessary to consider the work heretofore performed by the Interstate Commerce Commission on the line I am now discussing, which work will demonstrate beyond question that Congress could not possibly perform this task. This work has consumed almost the entire time of the Interstate Commerce Commission since its creation by Congress. A critical examination of the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission will show that 798 formal complaints involving excessive rates were filed by the shippers with the Commission since April 1, 1887, until March 1, 1905, and 493 informal complaints were filed with the Commission alleging excessive or exorbitant rates. The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission further show that during the same period shippers filed before the Commission 798 formal complaints in which discrimination is alleged and 860 informal complaints alleging unjust discrimination and other violations of the act to regulate commerce.

These various complaints coming from the shippers involve every possible feature of the act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission and defining its powers and duties, necessarily consuming the entire time of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Who will contend that Congress could have heard these numerous complaints? Think of the time that was necessarily consumed in the examination of pleadings, swearing of witnesses, and finding of facts so necessary to a complete and satisfactory solution of the many complex questions pending before that body. If Congress should remain in session from year to year, devoting its entire time to this work, it would be impossible to pass upon one-twentieth of these various complaints filed by the American shippers against the different railroad systems of our country. I repeat, if Congress can not pass an act providing that all interstate rates shall be reasonable and just, thus fixing a standard and delegating to the Commission the power to hear the facts and carry out the legislative will of Congress, then the American people are at the mercy of the railroads. I have no war to make on railroads. They are necessary to the development of our country and deserve fair, equal, and proper treatment at the hands of Congress. All property of every class—farms, banks, railroads, and merchandise—deserve equal and fair treatment at the hands of Congress. Railroads exercise the right of eminent domain. They can condemn homes, farms, and other property for the purpose of operating their lines, and this is proper. These corporations receive this power from the State, and I do not complain of it, for such power is necessary for the development of our country. Almost the entire time of the Commission has been consumed in hearing complaints and in settling disputes between the shippers and the roads.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the power to fix rates were given to the Commission, does the Senator think the number of complaints would increase or decrease?

Mr. CLAY. I desire to say to the Senator that for ten years the Interstate Commerce Commission exercised the power to hear complaints, to hear facts, and to pass upon whether or not rates were reasonable and just, and if the Senator will examine the reports of the Commission he will find that in most of the instances the cases were settled because the roads thought the Commission had the right to make rates.

In my opinion, if that power was delegated to the Commission a majority of the disputes between shippers and the roads would be settled by the shippers and the roads without ever going to the Commission. In my opinion, the Senator would find that the complaints would diminish instead of increase.

I do not insist that the power shall be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to originate and fix all interstate rates. That would be a herculean task, and it is extremely doubtful if any seven or eight men could get together and perform it. It would require experts. But what I insist upon is that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the right to hear the complaint of the citizen; that the shipper shall have a tribunal where he can go and make his complaint, present his grievance, and have a redress of his wrongs. Otherwise the railroads can fix any rate they see fit and proper, and the shipper is at the mercy of the roads because there is nowhere for the shipper to go for redress.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Are not the courts of the United States open to the shippers——

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. With absolute power in the courts to enforce their decrees?

Mr. CLAY. I wish to say to the Senator that under the common law where unreasonable rates are fixed, the shipper can go into the courts and file a bill asking that those rates be enjoined; but I say to the Senator that the man of ordinary means can not afford the great expense of going into the courts and litigating with the railroads. I think there ought to be a body where, without expense to the shipper, these questions can be settled and determined.

Mr. ALDRICH. Several of the bills now pending before the Committee on Interstate Commerce provide that it shall be done at the expense of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. I can not understand why some Senators are in favor of giving this power to the courts and not giving it to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I give it as my opinion that the courts can have nothing to do with this question, except to determine whether or not a rate is unreasonable, when an application for an injunction is filed before them. I do not believe that the courts have the right and power to go into the question as to what the future rate shall be. In fact, that question has been passed upon by the courts.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I could not find, some moments ago when the Senator and I were having a colloquy, the remarks I referred to. I now have them, and quote as follows. In answer to what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] had said, I stated:

> What I said was that a great many very excellent lawyers are of the opinion that Congress itself does not have the power to make specific rates. About that I will express no opinion. It may be they are in error.

Then I went on to discuss the question of delegating powers. But that is what I said explicitly.

Mr. CLAY. That is true.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not concede it. I said I would not go further than merely to call attention to the fact.

Mr. CLAY. It is true the Senator used that language, but he also used the language I have just quoted.

Mr. FORAKER. But, as I said, I used that language with reference to the language I had used in the colloquy with some Senator.

Mr. CLAY. It is immaterial——

Mr. FORAKER. It may be immaterial to the Senator——

Mr. CLAY. I mean no disrespect to the Senator from Ohio—not the slightest.

Mr. FORAKER. It may be immaterial to the Senator from Georgia, but not to me, for if I can not do anything more about this rate question, I will endeavor to keep the record straight.

Mr. CLAY. I hope the Senator will keep his record straight.

Mr. FORAKER. I will do so if I can get the attention of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. If Congress can not exercise this power through a commission, then I am at a loss to know how the people can expect proper relief. I rose, however, not for the purpose of discussing this question in a general way, but solely for the purpose of taking issue with the Senator from Ohio, denying to Congress the power to legislate that all rates shall be reasonable and just, thus fixing a standard, and then delegating to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to carry out the legislative will of Congress—to hear facts and ascertain what rates are reasonable and just—acting purely in an administrative capacity, carrying out the legislative will of Congress. The Senator is an able lawyer, and I have great respect for his legal opinions, but if the Senator has produced any authority except his own legal opinion on this subject, then such authority has escaped my attention. I do not think this an open question. I have never heard this authority seriously questioned until during this session of Congress. Let us see if it is an open question. We know that this is a very important question. The Senator from Ohio contends that Congress must hear the complaints of the shippers and must prescribe specifically in the law the maximum rates to be observed in the future.

As I have said before, we know that the large membership of Congress, with other important and legislative duties to perform, makes it almost impossible for Congress to meet and discharge such duties so largely administrative as those of fixing and enforcing freight rates. An examination of the laws of many of the States will show that the legislatures of different States have simply provided by statute that freight rates shall be reasonable and just, and have created by law State commissions, consisting of three or five members, to which was delegated the powers of supervision, the duty to hear complaints from shippers, and the power to fix rates in conformity with the law as fixed by the different legislatures. Such commissions are simply carrying out the legislative will and are acting purely in an administrative capacity. The constitutionality of the granting of such power has been passed upon by the courts time and again and always upheld. In these very cases it was claimed that the legislative power must be exercised by the legislature itself and could not be delegated to any other body, but the courts have uniformly held that where the legislature enacted that rates shall be reasonable and just, the duty of executing this law and of finding what rates are reasonable and just may be delegated to a commission, and that a grant of such power is not a delegation of legislative authority. If such laws, enacted by the legislatures of different States, have been sustained as constitutional, why can not Congress enact that all interstate freight rates shall be reasonable and just, and leave to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right and power to investigate and find out what rate will be a proper one, what rate will be just and impartial as between the shippers and the roads?

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that if Congress should give to the Commission the power to fix rates, as he desires, it would take away from the courts their right of control over the citizens' property which the Constitution has given them?

Mr. CLAY. I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would it diminish it in any form?

Mr. CLAY. If Congress should authorize the Commission to hear the facts and fix a rate that is reasonable and just, and if the Commission, instead of doing that, should put in operation a rate that is confiscatory, under the Constitution of the United States the railroads would have the right to go into the courts to test that question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose they were to put in operation a rate that was unreasonable and unjust?

Mr. CLAY. Then I say that that question has been passed upon by our courts, and our courts have held that they can not put into operation unreasonable rates.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not talking about putting rates in operation, but if we delegate to a subordinate tribunal this power, do you not take away from the courts their power?

Mr. CLAY. If we give to the Commission the power to fix rates in conformity to the law of Congress, then I would say that notwithstanding that fact the courts would still be open to the shippers and the roads to determine whether or not the Commission is carrying out the legislative will of Congress. Congress could not, in my opinion, pass a law that gave the Commission the power to fix a rate and prevent the courts from hearing the question in the event that the rate fixed was confiscatory. That question has been decided by our courts time and again.

Mr. ELKINS. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. ELKINS. Suppose, however, that the rate as fixed by the Commission is not confiscatory, but is within 1 cent of being confiscatory; then has a stockholder or the railroad company any right of review?

Mr. CLAY. I think that question has been decided.

Mr. ELKINS. Can the Senator point to a decision?

Mr. CLAY. I think I have some decisions here. That is not an open question. When Congress says that the rate must be reasonable and just, that means the road must make operating expenses and a fair remuneration on the money invested in the road. It does not mean that the road shall simply make expenses. No sensible man would insist that the railroads shall simply make operating expenses. They ought to give rates that are reasonable and just to the shipper and to themselves, and that is all that we on this side of the Chamber ask.

Mr. ELKINS. If Congress delegates to a subordinate tribunal its legislative discretion to fix a rate, and the tribunal does it, can the court review that question and decide it, outside of the question as to its being a confiscatory rate?

Mr. CLAY. It can; it has been done time and again. I want to call attention——

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CLAY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a case in 116 United States Reports——

Mr. ELKINS. What is the case?

Mr. CLAY. It is the case of Stone v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. The Senator will find in that case that this question was also discussed.

The legislature of the State of Mississippi created a commission and defined its powers and its duties, and the commission fixed a rate. The roads insisted that the rate was unreasonable, that it was not remunerative, and the courts of Mississippi decided against the railroads. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court held that the rate was unreasonable, and reversed the case.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; but let me suggest to the Senator, if he will pardon me for interrupting him for just a moment——

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. If the State of Mississippi, a sovereign State, can do that——

Mr. FORAKER. Senators on this side of the Chamber can not hear the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that what the sovereign State of Mississippi can do in the matter of rates is no standard by which to determine what the Congress of the United States can do.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. ELKINS. I know the decision, and the Senator has quoted it correctly. The court decided under the law of the State what the State could do; but when you come to the General Government, which is a government of enumerated powers, and Congress undertakes to confer rights upon a subordinate tribunal, and Congress delegates its rights or its authority, if it can do it, to this tribunal, then can a court review that action if it is not confiscatory? In other words, when Congress says the subordinate tribunal shall fix a rate, say, at 50 cents, can any court review its action?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CLAY. I want to read to the Senator from the Mississippi case to which he has referred. That case went to the Supreme Court of the United States on some clause of the Constitution of the United States. It went to the Supreme Court on the ground that the commission had fixed a rate which was unreasonable and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which says property shall not be taken without due process of law, and in my opinion if Congress itself should fix a rate that was unreasonable, that was confiscatory, that rate would be in violation of the clause of the Constitution to which I refer, and the courts would set aside the act of Congress beyond any question. Congress has to legislate in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States and the legislatures of the States have to legislate in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States. The legislatures of the States are bound by the constitutions of the respective States and the Constitution of the United States.

I rose, however, solely for the purpose of presenting authorities showing that Congress can, in a general way, prescribe a standard providing that all rates shall be reasonable and just and then leaving to the Commission the power to find what rates are reasonable and just and then to enforce its findings.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. FULTON. As I understand the question of the Senator from West Virginia it is this: Assuming that the Commission shall fix a rate which is not confiscatory nor unreasonable because it is too low, but unreasonable from the standpoint of the shipper because it is too high, the Commission having fixed that rate, if I understand the question of the Senator from West Virginia, can the shipper go into court and invoke the aid of the court to revise and review it?

Mr. CLAY. I will have to ask the Senator from Oregon to restate his question. My attention was diverted for the moment.

Mr. FULTON. I will state it again. We will assume that the Commission is granted power to prescribe rates; that it fixes a rate in a given case which is not confiscatory, which is not too low, but which is still open to the objection of not being a reasonable rate because it is too high, because it is an unreasonable rate. Nevertheless it has been fixed by the Commission. Can a shipper then go into court and complain of that rate and have a remedy in court, or is he bound by the rate fixed by the Commission? I think the question is a very interesting one.

Mr. CLAY. Congress empowers the Commission to fix rates that are reasonable and just. If the Commission fixes a rate that is confiscatory, too low, the Commission violates the legislative will of Congress.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; everybody agrees——

Mr. CLAY. Now, one moment. And then the road, if the rate is too low and is confiscatory, could go into the courts and enjoin it. If, on the contrary, the Commission fixed a rate that was too high and violated the legislative will of Congress, then the common-law right of the citizen would not be destroyed. In my opinion, he could go into the courts and file his bill and ask that the rate be enjoined because it was too high.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, let me ask the Senator——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Georgia referred to me a moment ago——

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator from Ohio wishes to ask me a question I will yield.

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Georgia so often——

Mr. CLAY. That is all right.

Mr. FORAKER. And I will not do it unless it is entirely agreeable.

Mr. CLAY. It is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. FORAKER. He appealed to me in connection with a case coming up from the State of Mississippi. I understood the Senator to say that it was held in that case by the supreme court of the State of Mississippi that the legislature had power to delegate its legislative authority to a commission which it had created to make rates, and that the commission had made rates, and that the action was sustained by the supreme court of the State and also by the Supreme Court of the United States.

That was a very different case from what would be inferred from the Senator's statement, if I have correctly repeated it. In that case the rates fixed by the commission had not been put into operation, and that was a suit brought to enjoin the enforcement of the statute, so that no particular rates were before the court. The general question before the court, so far as it had any relevancy here, was whether or not the act of the legislature of the State of Mississippi in creating a railroad commission and giving it a supervisory power over railroads in the way indicated, was in conflict with the constitution of the State of Mississippi. The supreme court of the State of Mississippi held that the act was not in conflict with the constitution of that State, and the Supreme Court of the United States agreed with the supreme court of the State of Mississippi. But, why? Because of the character of the constitution of Mississippi, which is very brief on that point, and with the Senator's permission I will read it. I read from the constitution of the State of Mississippi, as follows:

SEC. 186. The legislature shall pass laws to prevent abuses, unjust discrimination, and extortion in all charges of express, telephone, sleeping-car, telegraph, and railroad companies, and shall enact laws for the supervision of railroads, express, telephone, telegraph, sleeping-car companies and other common carriers in this State, by commission or otherwise——

Mr. CLAY. Right here——

Mr. FORAKER. In one moment [reading]—— and shall provide adequate penalties to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their franchises.

All that the Supreme Court held was that that act was not in conflict with the constitution of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to make an observation right here?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator reads from the constitution adopted November 1, 1890. The Senator will find that the law creating a railroad commission for the State of Mississippi and defining its power was passed in 1884. The Senator will find also—I interrupt him with his permission—that Mississippi adopted a constitution in 1868, and Mississippi amended her constitution in 1876. If there is any provision either in the constitution of 1868 or the amendments thereto providing that the regulation of freight rates shall be by commission or otherwise, I have not been able to find it. Consequently the clause which the Senator from Ohio read could not have any reference to the point now in question.

Mr. FORAKER. In making the citation I have I may be in error as to the date.

Mr. CLAY. I have the constitution of the State of Mississippi before me——

Mr. FORAKER. If so, of course, I withdraw that point. But the citation to the constitution of the State of Mississippi was given me along with others, and it was given me as adopted at a date which antedated that legislation.

Mr. CLAY. I have the case before me, and I will send it to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, quite aside from that, there is no holding by the Supreme Court here that a commission created in the way this would have to be, if there were no constitutional provisions on the subject, would have power to receive a delegation of power of the character provided.

Mr. CLAY. I must return to the authorities I was discussing. The legislature of Mississippi created a railroad commission and conferred upon it the power to fix and enforce rates for transportation of every kind within that State. The law of that State declared the rule by which the commission was to be guided—that the rate must be just and not discriminatory. This was the legislative will. The commission was empowered to find what rate would be just and nondiscriminatory. This was purely administrative and not legislative work. The point was made and argued with ability before the supreme court of Mississippi that the act conferred both legislative and judicial power on the commission and was repugnant to the constitution of Mississippi. The supreme court of Mississippi sustained the delegation of this power. The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the same contention. Mr. Justice Brewer used the following language in delivering the opinion of the court:

There can be no doubt of the general power of a State to regulate the fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroads and other carriers and that this regulation can be carried on by a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative body created by a State for carrying into effect the will of a State as expressed by its legislature.

No valid objection, therefore, can be made on account of the general features of this act—those by which the State has created the railroad commission and intrusted it with the duty of prescribing rates of fares and freights, as well as other regulations for the management of the railroads of the State. This case clearly affirms the right of a State legislature to confer the power upon a State commission to make rates within a State. Then why can not Congress confer the same upon the Interstate Commerce Commission over interstate transportation? (See also case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, 154 U. S., 362.)

Mr. ELKINS. Before the Senator from Georgia leaves that question, will he let me ask him a question? I will not interrupt him again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. Under the power of delegating to a subordinate tribunal authority to fix rates in a merely administrative way or otherwise, after Congress has established a standard, I want to ask the Senator if it is competent to review the action of the Commission as between a confiscatory rate on the one side and an extortionate rate on the other? There is a wide territory between these limitations, and what I want to get from the Senator as a lawyer is his opinion whether, after the delegation of this authority—you may call it the legislative discretion of Congress—to a subordinate tribunal, any court could review the action of the Commission between these two lines.

Mr. CLAY. I think so.

Mr. ELKINS. Then I would like to have the Senator address himself to that question.

Mr. CLAY. I will later on.

Mr. ELKINS. I hold that where the rate fixed by the Commission is within 1 cent of being confiscatory, Congress having delegated its legislative discretion, the courts can not review the action of the Commission.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that the Supreme Court, where the legislature of a State provided that the rate fixed by the State commission should be final and conclusive, has held such a provision to be in the teeth of the Constitution of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the legislature of a State can not delegate to a commission power to fix a rate that shall be final and conclusive. I think that was decided in a Minnesota case.

Mr. FULTON. Let me ask the Senator if that was not a case in which the court held that the rate was confiscatory. Was not that holding made in a case where the court held that the rate established by the Commission was confiscatory?

If the Senator will allow me, I will just briefly state my position on that point, so that I may not be misunderstood by my question. I believe that where the legislature or the Congress delegates to a commission the power to fix a rate, everybody is bound by that rate unless it be the carrier, which has a right to claim that the rate is confiscatory under the constitutional protection it has that its property shall not be taken without due process of law. But if the commission represents the legislature or Congress and Congress is operating through it, then the rate fixed by it must stand the same as a rate fixed by Congress. If a rate fixed by Congress be a certain amount, or if the Congress establishes a certain rate, surely nobody can complain of that because it is too high, because Congress has a perfect right to allow the carrier to charge any sum it may provide, so long as it is not confiscating the property of the carrier. I believe that the whole world except the carrier is bound by the rate, and it is bound by it unless it is confiscatory.

Now, I do not mean that Congress may not provide against such a consequence as that. I believe it can, and I believe that any bill should contain a provision that an individual shipper may come in and prosecute a suit on the ground that the rate is unreasonable as to him. I think such a clause would protect the shipper.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from West Virginia that the rule in Federal regulation is not necessarily the same as it is in State regulation in that respect. The prohibition upon the State is against depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." When you attack a State enactment, in order to establish its invalidity you must prove that it deprives the carrier of its property without due process of law; and there is, as suggested by the Senator from West Virginia, a very considerable latitude between a rate that might be too low and yet might not deprive a carrier of its property without due process of law and one which would be so low as to deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law. But when you come to exercise the right of regulation by the Congress, you are not necessarily limited to the prohibition against deprivation without due process of law, because the Federal limitation adds "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." Therefore when it comes to the Federal law, the test is twofold—that you shall not deprive any man of his property without due process of law nor shall you take it without just compensation.

It is perfectly true that the Supreme Court has on more than one occasion treated the prohibition against taking property without due process of law by the State as including the prohibition against taking it without just compensation; but my own opinion is that the Supreme Court has made that declaration without due consideration of all the clauses in the Constitution. The reason I do not believe that the prohibition against taking without due process of law includes the prohibition against taking without a just compensation is that in the fifth amendment to the Constitution both prohibitions appear. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia, I will read both, and one follows immediately after the other:

Nor shall be—

That is, any person—

be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Now, to my mind it is inconceivable that the wise men who framed this Constitution would have followed the prohibition against taking property without due process of law by another prohibition against taking it without just compensation, if they conceived that the latter was included in the former. Therefore I suggest that while you could only successfully attack a State law upon the allegation and proof that it deprives a carrier of his property without due process of law, yet when you come to Federal regulation a different rule might apply.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am unable to understand why Senators are so uneasy that this power delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission will be exercised oppressively. We submit questions of the greatest importance to Congress, to our Supreme Court, to our circuit courts, and to our district courts. Why not presume that the Interstate Commerce Commission, composed of an intelligent and upright body, will decide justly and fairly as between the railroads and the citizens? There seems to be an idea that in every instance the Interstate Commerce Commission will simply decide against the railroads. The presumption is that the Commission will hear the complaints of the shippers in an intelligent and an impartial way, and that the Commission will render a just and righteous decision and do justice to both the railroads and to the citizens.

Mr. President, I say that no one is justified in presuming, because this power is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the power will be exercised wrongfully and oppressively.

I rose for the purpose of arguing the question whether or not Congress could pass a law that all rates shall be reasonable and just, fixing a standard, and then leave to the Commission the power to find the facts and say what rates are reasonable and just. I have no desire to oppress railroads. They deserve at the hands of Congress the same fair treatment that the banker deserves, that the farmer deserves. But ought not some tribunal to have the power to hear the difference between the shippers and the roads and say which is right? Ought the roads to settle the difference between the shippers and themselves? Mr. President, the railroads would not be impartial, and neither would the shipper.

If you leave it to the shipper, in many instances he will want his freight carried for scarcely nothing, and the roads will want to charge him more than what is right and proper. It is just and right that power should be lodged somewhere to try these differences and adjust them between the roads and the shippers.

The right of Congress to confer upon a commission the rate-making power was discussed by the court in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company (167 U. S., 479). It is true that the real question at issue before the court in this case was: Did the act creating the Commission give the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to hear complaints and prescribe future rates? And the court decided that no such power was given by the law creating the Commission and defining its powers. But Mr. Justice Brewer, in speaking for the court, said:

While the present inquiry is limited to the question as to what Congress determined should be done with reference to the matter of rates, there were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for the consideration of Congress.

First. Congress might itself prescribe the rates.

To this proposition the Senator from Ohio has given his assent.

Second. Or it might submit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the railroads the right to make the rates.

Mr. Justice Brewer said administrative control over railroads through boards or commissions was no new thing. It has been resorted to in England and in many of the States of the Union.

This subject was again discussed by our Supreme Court in the case of Chicago, etc., Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418). The legislature of Minnesota passed an act establishing a railroad commission, giving the commission the power to regulate freight rates in that State, and the act provided that the rates of charges for the transportation of property recommended and published by the commission shall be final and conclusive as to what are equal and reasonable charges, and that there can be no judicial investigation as to the reasonableness of such rates. This law deprived the railroads of the right to go into the courts and test the question as to whether or not the rates fixed were just and reasonable.

If this law had been sustained, the Commission had the power to fix rates that would have been confiscatory, and the roads would have been without remedy. This act was held to be unconstitutional, as depriving the roads of their property. Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court. Speaking for a majority of the court he affirms the right of Congress to make rates through a commission, and Mr. Justice Miller, in a concurring opinion, affirms such right. Mr. Justice Miller said the power which the legislature has to do this can be exercised through a commission, which it may authorize to act in the matter, such as the one appointed by the legislature of Minnesota by the act now under consideration.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered a dissenting opinion on the main question, but fully agreed with the majority of the court on the question now under consideration. Mr. Justice Bradley said:

I think it perfectly clear and well settled by the decisions of this court that the legislative branch of the Government might have fixed the rates in question. If it had done so, it would have done it through the aid of committees appointed to investigate the subject, to acquire information, to cite papers, to get all the facts before them, and finally decide and report.

Mr. Justice Bradley said:

No one could have said this was not due process of law. And if the legislature could do this, acting by its committees, I can see no good reason why it might not delegate this duty to a board of commissioners, charged, as the board in this case was, to regulate and fix the charges so as to be equal and reasonable. Such a board—

Said Mr. Justice Bradley—

would have at its hands all the means of getting at the truth and ascertaining the reasonableness of fares and freights which a legislative committee has. It might or might not swear witnesses and examine parties. Its duty being of an administrative character, it would have the widest scope for examination and inquiry.

Mr. Justice Gray and Mr. Justice Lamar concurred in this opinion with Mr. Justice Bradley.

Clearly, to my mind, when Congress declares that all rates shall be reasonable and just and not discriminatory, this is a legislative declaration furnishing all the standard that is required, and then Congress may submit to an executive board the power to determine the actual rates which such standard calls for.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but my silence might be taken as either assent or dissent, I presume. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact now, so there can not be any mistake in this instance, that the statute under which the court was making this construction did not authorize the commissioners of the State of Minnesota to make rates in the sense in which power was delegated to them of a legislative character. They were authorized when they condemned a rate to ascertain what, in their opinion, would be a reasonable rate to take the place of it, and they were authorized to recommend to the railroad the adoption by the railroad of that rate, and if the railroad did not within ten days adopt the rate thus recommended the commission was given power to go into the court and by a writ of mandamus to compel the railroad to do so, or by a writ of injunction to restrain the railroad from longer charging in excess of that rate. That statute is set out in the margin in 134 United States as the statute before the court.

So whatever may be the fact as to the Mississippi statute being passed before the constitutional amendment or as to its being adopted before or after the decision of the court, there can not be any mistake about this being the statute that was before the Supreme Court when it made the decision the Senator has referred to. It shows conclusively that the legislature of Minnesota for very wise and conclusive reasons saw fit to avoid conferring upon the commission the power absolutely to fix rates according to any standard. It could recommend the rate and then could go into court.

Mr. CLAY. The position of the Senator does not change the position which I am contending for in the least. I was reading from this decision showing that the court was of the opinion that Congress could delegate to the Commission the power to fix rates.

Mr. FORAKER. But I suppose there will be no difference of opinion about the proposition that the court when it employed that language had reference to the kind of contention that had been made in the case before it. It was of an administrative character purely and simply.

Mr. CLAY. I have read the law as the court announced it. I have simply given the opinion of the court as it was announced. The judge delivering the opinion of the court said in substance that it was administrative work.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I do not contend that Congress can pass a statute simply saying that the Interstate Commerce Commission can originate and fix rates as it sees proper, without any regard to reasonableness or justice, and that such a law could be enforced. That probably would be delegating to the Interstate Commerce Commission legislative power. But if Congress fixes a standard prescribing what kind of rates the Commission shall fix, then that is an entirely different question.

This subject has been ably discussed by the Attorney-General, the first law officer of our Government, in a letter addressed to Hon. STEPHEN B. ELKINS, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the United States Senate, of date May 5, 1905. This letter is an exhaustive argument, fully sustaining the views I have thus expressed on this important subject. The Attorney-General sustains this power by a line of authorities that are unanswerable. I read extracts bearing upon this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, May 5, 1905.

Hon. STEPHEN B. ELKINS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

SIR. I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter requesting, on behalf of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, my opinion on certain questions of law.

Your letter, supplemented by oral communication, calls upon me to consider the governmental power to regulate the operations of railroads, especially in the respect of fixing rates for transportation, by whom that power, so far as it exists in the National Government, may be exercised constitutionally, and what limits to the power, if any, are prescribed by the Constitution.

After great consideration it was settled in the group of cases commonly called the "Granger cases," that there is a governmental power to regulate the operations of railroads acting as common carriers, and, as a part of such regulation, to prescribe the maximum rates which they may charge in the future for the services which they shall render to those who resort to them, and that the power is vested in, and may be exercised by, the legislative branch of the Government.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S., 113.

Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company v. Iowa, 94 U. S., 155.

Peik v. Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, 94 U. S., 164.

Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company v. Ackley, 94 U. S., 179.

Winona and St. Peter Railroad Company v. Blake, 94 U. S., 180.

Stone v. Wisconsin, 94 U. S., 181.

These cases were concerned with the regulation of rates by the legislature of the State for transportation beginning and ending within the State. The principle announced in them was affirmed in Ruggles v. Illinois (108 U. S., 526), and Illinois Central Railroad Company v. The People of the State of Illinois (108 U. S., 541), has been adopted as the rule of decision in many subsequent opinions of the Supreme Court and of the highest courts of the States, and although originally established over dissent, is now acquiesced in by all as the settled law of the land.

Under the division of the governmental power made by the Constitution of the United States the authority to regulate the charges of railroads, so far as those charges are made for traffic which is exclusively within the States, resides in the legislatures of the States, and so far as they are made for other traffic resides in Congress. (Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 8, paragraph 3.) This division of power is fundamental, has been recognized in all the cases, and is illustrated clearly by both the majority and dissenting opinions in Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway Company v. Illinois (118 U. S., 557).

In the earlier cases before the court the legislatures had prescribed specifically in the law the maximum rates to be observed in the future. Legislatures obviously, however, can deal with such questions only in the most general way. Their large and changing membership, infrequent and limited sessions, and procedure designed for legislation rather than administration, were ill adapted to duties so largely administrative as those of fixing and enforcing rates. Laws, therefore, were passed by many of the States enacting that rates should be impartial and reasonable, and creating a small body, often called a "railroad commission," to which was intrusted, among other powers of supervision, the duty of fixing rates in detail in conformity with the rule declared in the law. The constitutionality of the grant of such power to a commission was speedily drawn in question before the courts. It was claimed that the laws violated the well-settled principle that legislative power must be exercised by the legislature itself and can not be delegated to any other body. But the courts have held that where the legislature has enacted that railway rates shall be impartial and reasonable the duty of executing this law and determining the rates for the future in detail in conformity with it may be conferred constitutionally upon an administrative body, and that a grant of such power is not a delegation of the legislative authority. It is sufficient to refer to a few only of the cases which support this view and to say that no case which opposes it has come to my knowledge.

Attorney-General's opinion:

The foregoing cases dealing with the right of State legislatures to establish a rate-making commission, the clear analogy in this respect between their authority and that of Congress, and the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company (supra), establish beyond doubt the right of Congress to confer upon an administrative body the power to fix and determine maximum railway rates which shall control in the future by the execution in detail of a general rule enacted into law, as, for example, that the rates shall be just, reasonable, and without discrimination.

The Attorney-General reaches the following conclusions:

1. There is a governmental power to fix the maximum future charges of carriers by railroads vested in the legislatures of the States with regard to transportation exclusively within the States, and vested in Congress with regard to all other transportation.

2. Although legislative power, properly speaking, can not be delegated, the lawmaking body, having enacted into law the standard of charges which shall control, may intrust to an administrative body not exercising in the true sense judicial power the duty to fix rates in conformity with that standard.

3. The rate-making power is not a judicial function and can not be conferred constitutionally upon the courts of the United States, either by way of original or appellate jurisdiction.

4. The courts, however, have the power to investigate any rate or rates fixed by legislative authority and to determine whether they are such as would be confiscatory of the property of the carrier, and if they are judicially found to be confiscatory in their effect to restrain their enforcement.

5. Any law which attempts to deprive the courts of this power is unconstitutional.

6. Any regulation of land transportation, however exercised, would seem to be so indirect in its effect upon the ports that it could not constitute a preference between the ports of different States within the meaning of Article I, section 9, paragraph 6, of the Constitution.

7. Reasonable, just, and impartial rates determined by legislative authority are not within the prohibition of Article I, section 9, paragraph 6, of the Constitution, even though they result in a varying charge per ton per mile to and from the ports of the different States.

In the case of Butterfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470) this same question is fully discussed. This case illustrates the class of cases in which the legislature may leave administrative details to an executive officer or board without delegating any portion of legislative power.

This same question was discussed by the supreme court of my State in 1882 in the case of the Georgia Railroad et al. v. Smith et al., Railroad Commissioners, et al. (See 70 Ga. Report, p. 694.) The legislature of Georgia passed an act creating a railroad commission, defining its powers and duties and prescribing that all rates shall be reasonable and just, and delegating to the State commission power to hear facts and ascertain what rates are resonable and just, and to enforce its findings. The point was made by able counsel that this provision of the act violated the constitution which delegated legislative power to the legislature and that the legislature was not authorized to delegate such power as was granted to the railroad commission.

The court decided that the object of the constitutional provision conferring power upon the legislature to regulate railroad freights and passenger tariffs to prevent unjust discrimination and require reasonable and just freights and tariffs, and making it the duty of the legislature to pass laws in furtherance of this provision, was to give proper protection to the citizens against unjust rates for the transportation of freights and passengers over the railroads of the State and to prevent unjust discrimination, even though the rates might be just. The court said it was not expected that the legislature should do more than pass laws to accomplish the ends in view; nor were they required to enter into the details of settling freights and tariffs over all the railroads in the State. The railroad commissioners are officers appointed to carry into execution the laws passed by the legislature, and are constitutional officers. The powers of the railroad commissioners are not legislative. The power to adopt rules and regulations to carry into effect a law already passed differs from a power to enact the law.

Judge Crawford delivered the opinion, and he was one of the ablest judges that ever presided over that court. In delivering the opinion he said:

The constitution of 1877 confers upon the legislature the power and authority of regulating freight and passenger tariffs, preventing unjust discriminations and requiring reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs. It further makes it the duty of the legislature to pass laws from time to time to carry into effect this constitutional provision and to enforce the same by adequate penalties.

Judge Crawford says the object of the constitutional provision and the legislative enactment was to give proper protection to the citizen against unjust rates for the transportation of freights and passengers over the railroads of the State and to prevent unjust discriminations, even though the rates might be just. It was not expected that the legislature should do more than pass laws to accomplish the ends in view. When this was done, says Judge Crawford, its duty had been discharged. All laws are carried into execution by means of officers appointed for that purpose. Some with more, others with less, but all must be clothed with power sufficient for the effectual execution of the law to be enforced.

Legislative grants of power to the officers of the law to make rules and regulations which are to have the force and effect of laws are by no means uncommon in the history of our legislation. I need only mention the power given to the judges of the supreme and superior courts of this State to establish rules which, if not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, of this State, or the laws thereof, are binding and must be obeyed. And it has never been claimed that they were unconstitutional because they had not been passed by the legislature and read three times, and on separate days, in each house of the general assembly.

The act of October 14, 1879—

Says Judge Crawford, delivering the opinion of the court—provides that fair and reasonable rates only shall be charged by the railroads of the State.

Did the Constitutional Convention, by paragraph 1, section 2, and Article IV, intend more than the passage of a general law, such as this, to carry into effect the clause here referred to? It certainly was not contemplated that the details of rates to be fixed over the many miles of railway in the States should be settled and determined by the legislature. The many influences that combine to cause changes in the ever varying vicissitudes of trade and travel were neither overlooked nor forgotten by that body. The utter impossibility of preparing by the legislature just and proper schedules for the various railroads, with their differences of length, locality, and business, appears to us to be so clear and manifest as that to have entertained would have been absolutely absurd. Judge Crawford said the difference between the power to pass a law and the power to adopt rules and regulations to carry into effect a law already passed is apparent and strikingly great, and this we understand to be the distinction recognized by all the courts as the true rule in determining whether or not in such case a legislative power is granted. The former would be unconstitutional, while the latter would not.

Judge Crawford, continuing, said:

The general assembly of Georgia is expressly required by paragraph 1, section 2, Article IV, to pass laws from time to time to regulate freight and passenger tariffs, and to prohibit unjust discrimination and the charging of unjust and unreasonable rates by the railroad companies of the State. The fixing of just and reasonable maximum rates for all the railroads in the State is clearly a duty which can not be performed by the legislature unless it remain in perpetual session and devote a large portion of its time to its performance. The question, What are just and reasonable rates? is one which presents different phases from month to month upon every road in the State, and in reference to all the innumerable articles and products that are the subjects of transportation. This question can only be satisfactorily solved by a board which is in perpetual session, and whose time is largely given to the consideration of the subject.

Judge Crawford says:

It is obvious that to require the duty of prescribing rates for the railroads of the State to be performed by the general assembly, consisting of a senate, with 44 members, and a house of representatives, with 175, and which meets in regular session only once in two years, and then only for a period of forty days, would result in the most ill-advised and haphazard schedules, and be productive of the greatest inconvenience and injustice, in some cases to the railroad companies and in others to the people of the State. It is impractical for such a body to prescribe just and reasonable rates. To insist that this duty must be performed by the general assembly itself is to defeat the purpose of that clause of the Constitution under consideration. The bestowal of such powers upon a commission is not to be considered as trenching upon the maxim that legislative power is not to be delegated, since the maxim is to be understood in the light of the immemorial practice of this country and England, which has always recognized the propriety of vesting in municipal corporations certain powers of local regulation in respect to which the parties immediately interested may fairly be supposed more than competent to judge of their needs than any central authority.

The case of Fields v. Clark (143 U. S., 650) illustrates and sustains the position for which I am contending. Congress passed an act conferring authority upon the President to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and to suspend, by proclamation, the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides when he is satisfied any country producing such articles imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which he may deem to be reciprocally unequal or unreasonable. The constitutionality of this act was brought in question because it transferred to the President legislative power. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court and sustained the constitutionality of the law. Mr. Justice Harlan said:

What the President was required to do was simply in the act of Congress. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking power to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of law.

Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending upon the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it can not be said that the exercise of such discretion is the making of the law. Mr. Justice Harlan says:

The legislature can not delegate its authority, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend. To deny this would stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation depends which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

This same question was discussed again in the case of the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railway Company v. Minnesota by the supreme court of that State and the doctrine affirmed, and the case went to the Supreme Court of the United States and is found in 186 United States, page 257.

The act of the legislature of Minnesota creating a railroad commission—is not unconstitutional in assuming to establish joint through rates or tariffs over the lines of independent and connecting railroads and apportioning and dividing the joint earnings.

Says the court—

Such a commission—

has a clear right to pass upon the reasonableness of contracts in which the public is interested, whether such contracts be made directly with the patrons of the road or by a joint action between the railroads in the transportation of persons and property in which the public is indirectly concerned.

The presumption is that the rates fixed by the Commission are reasonable, and the burden of proof is upon the railroad company to show to the contrary.

This opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Brown and expressed the unanimous opinion of the court. This same subject was discussed at length by Judge Woods, of the circuit court of the fifth judicial circuit (see Woods's Reports, vol. 4, in the case of George H. Tilley v. The Savannah, Florida and Western Railway Company; Thomas M. Smith, Campbell Wallace, and Samuel Barrnett, railroad commissioners; and Robert N. Ely, attorney-general, page 427.) Judge Woods discussed the subject fully and decided that the power to regulate railroad freights and passenger tariffs being conferred by the constitution of Georgia upon the legislature, the question, What are just and reasonable rates, is a legislative and not a judicial one. And that the delegation to railroad commissioners of the duty of making a schedule of reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs, by which the railroad companies were to be governed, is not in violation of paragraph 1, section 2, Article IV, of the constitution of Georgia.

Judge Woods, circuit justice, in delivering the opinion, said:

It is settled that railroad companies are subject to legislative control as to their rates of fare and freight unless protected by their charters.

Justice Woods said:

The complainant next insists that paragraph 1, section 2, of Article IV, of the constitution of Georgia requires the general assembly itself to regulate railroad freight and passenger tariffs and prohibit unjust discriminations on the railroads of the State and prohibit them from charging other than just and reasonable rates, and that the delegation of this duty to the railroad commissioners is not warranted by the constitution.

Counsel insisted, he says, that the act of October 14, 1879, delegates to the railroad commission legislative power, which, by the constitution, is conferred exclusively upon the legislature.

Mr. Circuit Justice Woods further said:

The paragraph of the constitution which authorizes and requires the action of the general assembly on this subject does not in terms require that body to prescribe the rates of freights and fares. It is required "to pass laws to regulate freight and passenger tariffs." It has in performance of this duty declared that the rates charged by the railroad companies should be just and reasonable, and appointed a commission to fix the maximum of just and reasonable rates, beyond which the railroad companies shall not go. This action seems to fall strictly within the terms of the authority on which it is based.

If, however, the power conferred on the commissioners can only be exercised under the constitution by the legislature, the act conferring such powers must be declared void.

Mr. Justice Woods reaches this conclusion, and after careful consideration of this point he is satisfied that the duties imposed by the act upon the commissioners are not legislative and are not necessarily to be performed by the legislature.

Mr. Circuit Justice Woods says:

If the act had declared that no railroad company should charge other than just and reasonable rates, and that the board of directors of every railroad in the State should prescribe maximum charges, which should be posted at each station, and beyond which the ticket and freight agents of the company should not go, it could not reasonably be charged that the directors were clothed with legislative power.

Mr. Circuit Justice Woods asks the question:

Is the case altered when the general assembly, instead of making the board of directors the body to fix maximum rates, appoints an independent commission to perform this task?

It is a familiar rule of constitutional construction that a grant of legislative power to do a certain thing carries with it the power to use all proper and necessary means to accomplish the end.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator a question right there.

Mr. CLAY. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. I read that case carefully myself, and I confess I can not follow the reasoning of Judge Woods in just what the Senator has now read. Does not the Senator see a great distinction between saying to a board of directors of a railroad corporation that they shall have the power of fixing rates, and saying to a commission, which has nothing to do with rates, that they shall have power to fix rates—in other words, have not the directors the power to determine the value or the use of their own property entirely outside of legislative authority—and therefore are the two cases at all parallel?

Mr. CLAY. I will very frankly say to the Senator that I do not think they are. I think that the railroads owning their property and having a board of directors would have, beyond any question, the right, in the absence of any law, to fix a rate. However, while I do not agree with the reasoning of the court in that particular, the court goes on to state the case very carefully, and decides that the power to find out what are reasonable and just rates is an administrative and not a legislative power.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, may I call the attention of the Senator to a part of the reasoning of Judge Woods in that case, in which he says:

The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of a power to make law, which necessarily involves the discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law.

That is the substance of the distinction on which Judge Woods bases his decision in that particular case. When you follow that distinction up, it seems to me that it shades away into almost airy nothingness.

If I may trouble the Senator a moment further——

Mr. CLAY. I do not want to yield for an argument, because I wish to go on, as I am occupying the floor through the courtesy of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not take one moment of the Senator's attention if he does not wish to grant it at this time, but if he will yield I should just like to make that point clear.

Mr. CLAY. Go on.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not the delegation there purely and simply a delegation to the Commission itself to fix the rate? If it is, is it not a delegation also that the administrative body, which is to determine the administrative question, shall also apply the rule which is to govern? Therefore it is purely and simply a making of law, because there is nothing that comes into existence fixing the rule until the rule is applied. That seems to me to be the point.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that I think when the legislative body prescribes that the rate shall be an equal, impartial, and just rate that is a fixing of the rate; that is the legislative body fixing the rate and leaving it to another body to find what is a just and reasonable rate. I think when Congress prescribes in a general way that all rates shall be just that is the standard, and then that the work to be performed by the Commission in coming up to that standard is not legislative, but the Commission is simply finding and carrying out the standard fixed by Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAPP. In that proposition is there not another thought involved, which seems to be lost sight of here; and that is that the declaration of the legislature giving life and vitality to the determination of the Commission which is acting under it, the declaration being made in advance, constitutes, in my mind, the action of the legislature operating upon the finding of the Commission.

Mr. CLAY. I must not take up too much time of the Senate, but I wish to refer to the case in 192 United States Reports, where a similar question was discussed, if I remember correctly. That was a case arising under an act of Congress providing that teas of an inferior quality should not be imported into the United States. My recollection is that Congress provided in the act that the Secretary of the Treasury should appoint a commission, and that commission should examine the teas that were imported into this country and see whether or not they were of an inferior quality; and if found to be of an inferior quality, the tea was to be rejected. Certain parties imported into this country teas alleged to be of an inferior quality, and the teas were seized on the ground that they had been adjudged to be of an inferior quality and not of the quality which Congress intended should be allowed to come into the United States. The owners of the teas made the point that Congress had said that teas of an inferior quality should not be imported into the United States, and then left to the Secretary of the Treasury the appointment of a board to pass upon these teas and determine whether or not they were of an inferior quality; the point was made that Congress itself ought to have prescribed the quality of tea and specified the grades of tea that should come into the United States, contending that this was a delegation of legislative authority. The court held that Congress had provided that inferior tea should not come into the United States, thus prescribing the standard of tea that should come into the United States, and that the board of appraisers, which examined the teas to ascertain whether or not they were of an inferior nature, were acting purely in an administrative capacity in finding facts, that they were executing the law that had been passed by Congress, and that that was not delegating legislative power to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Numerous other State authorities could be cited to sustain this contention, but those already presented are so overwhelming I do not deem it necessary to take up the further time of the Senate to sustain the position for which I am contending.

The position for which I am contending, and so necessary for the protection of American people, is sustained by an abundance of authority. I do not contend that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be clothed with a power to originate rates. The roads in the first instance should be allowed to fix the rates, and if the roads fix such rates as are reasonable and just to the shippers, then these rates ought to stand. On the contrary, if rates are originated by the roads that are unreasonable and unjust to the shippers, then the American shippers should have somewhere to go to file their complaints and secure redress from wrongs. Railroads can destroy towns, cities, and private industries by improper rates, and who will say that power should not be lodged somewhere to investigate intelligently all complaints, solely with a view of doing justice between the roads and the shippers? The presumption is that an intelligent broad-minded commission will be impartial and seek diligently to do justice to both sides. Why presume that the Commission will decide adversely to the roads? Why presume that narrow-minded partisans, easily influenced by public clamor, will be appointed to discharge this duty? It will not be a difficult task to secure honest, intelligent, upright men to perform this work, and no other kind ought to be appointed.

When Congress passed the law to regulate commerce, approved April 4, 1887, and in effect April 5, 1887, Congress had several objects in view. The law provided that all charges made for any service rendered in the transportation of passengers or property, as aforesaid, shall be reasonable and just; and very unjust and unreasonbale charge for such service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful. Who will contend that this feature of the law was not right and proper? The law also provided that if any common carrier subject to provisions of the act shall directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of the act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, and which is hereby declared to be unlawful. This section of the Interstate Commerce Commission law was intended clearly to prevent unjust discrimination. The act to regulate commerce intended that every citizen and every community should have equal and just treatment by the common carriers. Who will say that this was not proper?

The third section provided that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preferences or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality in any particular description of traffic. This section intended to prevent unreasonable preferences or advantages to any shipper or to any community. Congress intended to say that every shipper should have equal treatment and equal chances to make a living so far as freight rates are concerned, and that no advantage should be given to one person over another or to one city or town or community over another. Who will say that this was not right?

It is not my desire to cripple the railroad industry of the country. Congress itself desires to protect the people of the United States against unjust and unreasonable rates and against unreasonable preferences and unjust discriminations. Congress desires to give every citizen an equal chance in the race for wealth and honor. Then follows the long and short haul provision of the act. A critical examination of the debates will show that while this bill was pending before Congress to regulate interstate commerce Congress at that time intended to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to hear complaints and prescribe reasonable and just rates.

This is a question of vast importance to the American people. The aggregate length of railway mileage in the United States on June 30, 1904, was 213,904.34 miles. The aggregate amount of railway stocks on June 30, 1904, was $6,339,889,322. The aggregate earnings from the operation of the railways in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1904, amounted to $1,975,-174,091. Of this amount, $444,326,991 was received from the transportation of passengers and $1,379,002,693 for the transportation of freight. The vast amount of money invested in these enterprises and the enormous sum paid for freight and passenger service make this question one of no ordinary importance. The President in his message has asked that such power be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The party to which I belong in the last national convention in St. Louis, which nominated a candidate for President and Vice-President, adopted a platform in favor of granting such power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Since the Supreme Court held that the act creating the Commission and defining its powers did not give express authority to the Commission to hear complaints, reduce and prescribe future rates, the Commission in each annual report has honestly besought Congress to so amend the Interstate Commission law as to give the Commission this power. Fully 75 per cent of the American people favor such legislation.

Why have an Interstate Commerce Commission clothed with the power to investigate rates and to find out what rates will be reasonable and just and leave the Commission without any power to enforce its findings. Of what service can the Interstate Commerce Commission be to the American people if it has the right simply to investigate rates put in operation by the railroads and find out whether they are just or unjust and then have no power to put in operation its findings? What good can come to the American people from the Commission with the law as it now stands? Why should the United States Government pay the expenses of the Interstate Commerce Commission when the Commission is clothed with the power to look into rates originated by the railroads, and if the Commission finds rates to be unjust and unreasonable then the Commission is not empowered to force the roads to change the rates so as to make them reasonable and just? Who believes that Congress intended to create a commission with simply the right to investigate without the power to enforce its findings so as to do justice between the people and the railroads? I would repeal the law creating the Commission unless the Commission is clothed with the power both to investigate and find what rates are reasonable and impartial and at the same time enforce its findings. It is absurd to have an Interstate Commerce Commission constantly investigating the railroad rates, knowing at the same time whatever may be the findings of the Commission in regard to rates the Commission is without power to enforce any of its findings. The people want a commission clothed with the power to find and fix a proper and reasonable rate and to put that rate in operation. Otherwise the Commission is useless.

American people pay annually nearly two billions of dollars for freight and passenger fares. Since the Supreme Court held that the Commission had not been invested with the power to modify or reduce any rate of charges established and fixed by the carrier, a power which the Commission exercised from the time of its organization, the law stands as it did before the Commission was created.

The people are not benefited by the law creating the Commission without the power to fix rates. By virtue of these decisions all doubt has been removed, and the carriers may establish their own rates and charges and may judge for themselves what rates are reasonable and just. Surely the shipper is at the mercy of the carrier. However unjust and unreasonable the rate may be, the shipper is without remedy. He has no tribunal clothed with the power to hear his complaints. The law, as interpreted by the courts, denies the authority to the Commission to fix a reasonable rate for the future. This leaves the Commission without authority, in the absence of additional legislation, for which I am now contending, to hear and settle the differences between the railroads and the shippers. The general public had expected a more satisfactory and complete remedy for transportation abuses.

These decisions furnish an abundance of reasons why additional legislation should at once be enacted in such unmistaken terms that the Commission can not misconstrue and the public will not be misled by it. The original act creating the Commission declared that the Commission is authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of the act; that the Commission shall investigate, inquire into, report, and order the discontinuance of all violations of these or other provisions of the law, and shall execute the law by petition to the court to enforce such order, which the act requires the court to do whenever the order is lawful.

I want it, however, clearly understood that I do not insist that Congress shall attempt to cripple the railroad corporations of the country. Far from it. I recognize the fact that the owners of railroad property should, in the first instance, be allowed to develop their own property; that they should be allowed to make rates; but they should be required to make rates that are reasonable and just to the shipper. If they do not do that, then the power ought to be lodged somewhere where the shipper can go and make his complaint and be heard. I believe the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to what is a reasonable and just rate ought to be regarded as prima facie correct, and that the burden ought to be upon the roads to show that the rate is not a reasonable and just rate before it is ever set aside. We had just as well recognize to-day that while a large amount of money is invested in railroads, the American people are paying many millions every year for freight and passenger fare. I will not say whether those rates are just or unjust, as I have not looked into it sufficiently to be able to tell, but I do say with the American people paying such an enormous amount of money for passenger fare and freight rates there ought to be power lodged somewhere where the rate can be passed upon by an upright and impartial tribunal, and let that tribunal determine what is a reasonable and just rate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

Nobody will insist that Congress can do this. If Congress were to stay here in session all the time, it could not hear one-twentieth of the complaints of shippers. Nobody will say that Congress can take up these various complaints, pass upon them, and fix the rates that should be charged between the shipper and the railroads.

Now I will yield to the Senator from Kansas.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish at this time to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that before adjournment on Monday, February 12, a vote shall be taken on the bill and all amendments pending and to be offered.

Mr. DANIEL. When is that time?

Mr. GALLINGER. Monday, February 12, three weeks from to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business, being Senate bill 529, and all amendments thereto, shall be voted on before adjournment on Monday, February 12 next. Is there objection?

Mr. DANIEL. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will extend the time to February 19—four weeks from to-day.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator will postpone his request.

Mr. DANIEL. It is not debatable, but if permissible I should like to make an observation or two.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this is a very important measure. It inaugurates a new system. It is the entering wedge, as might be expected, for a very large and long-extended expenditure of public funds. It comes at a time when we are trying to be economical in order to sustain at home and in our domestic relations the proper progress the Government should make each year.

I see no occasion as yet to fix a time to vote upon this bill.

We have had very little debate upon it. A very able and interesting address from the Senator from New Hampshire has, of course, preceded it, and we have had one admirable speech from the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

It seems to me that it would be wise to let it take its course from time to time. No amendments have been offered to the bill. The Senate has really not fixed its attention upon its details.

While I do not wish to try to engage the attention of the Senate, I will state an inquiry which has been entering into my mind upon the subject. If we are to have a measure of this kind and if some of the fishermen of the country are to be put into a naval militia, it has occurred to me that other fishermen might as well be put into the naval militia at the same time. We need to defend our coasts, and if deep-sea fishermen are to be employed and paid, from year to year, to defend our coasts, I do not see why those who fish in our streams and bays and estuaries should not be employed also.

This is but one suggestion that I would make now; but the objection I have to fixing a time for voting upon the bill is that the consideration of it is not at all ripe before the Senate. We have not had its details discussed in any such way as to prepare the minds of Senators for the thorough understanding of what it means and will mean hereafter. I should hope that the Senator would defer fixing a day for the final vote until that time of ripeness has come.

I will say to him further, lest I be misapprehended, that it never has been my purpose and is not now my purpose to attempt to delay either the consideration or the final vote upon any measure offered in good faith, as this undoubtedly is, and of a nature which each man is perfectly free to vote upon, without those objections which go too deep for him to be willing to see it pass after any consideration. It is a commercial question, a financial question, and one of the kind of questions which ought to be considered and based upon any reasonable time whenever the Senate is disposed to do so. But it ought to be a ripe time, after full and detailed consideration, and that time, in my judgment, has not come.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if necessary, I will ask unanimous consent to briefly reply, although the bill is now before the Senate, and I can proceed to talk, if I choose. But I want, before doing so, to make another request. It is that this bill shall be voted upon on Monday, March 5, which is six weeks from the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill which is the unfinished business shall be voted upon before the adjournment of the Senate on Monday, March 5. Is there objection?

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, the bill presents a question of order preliminary, which ought to be disposed of by this body before there is any vote on the bill, in my judgment.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the question of order, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. MALLORY. The question of the right of the Senate to originate revenue legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think two Senators on the other side have suggested that they will make a point of order against that provision of the bill. I think the Senator from Florida does not seriously believe that the Senate shall usurp the functions of the Supreme Court and determine the constitutionality of bills before they are acted on by this body.

Mr. MALLORY. I do think the Senate has a right to determine for itself what it shall and shall not do under its constitutional power, and I am very much inclined to think the Senate has no right to initiate such legislation as is contained in the eighth section of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That, of course, is the Senator's opinion. Does the Senator think the Senate can not properly consider and pass a bill of that kind, even though it may hereafter be declared unconstitutional?

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, I do not question the right of the Senate to consider it. As I remarked the other day, it can consider it in an academic way. But I do think it would be wrong for us to pass the bill unless we have that question settled. I object to fixing a given day until that question is settled by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withdraw my request and proceed to consider the bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say on the question of order——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not kindly postpone that until my colleague concludes his speech?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have yielded day after day now for more than two weeks to Senators to make speeches. The Senators on the other side know that I always want to be courteous. I want to be courteous to-day, but when Senators refuse absolutely to fix a time, six or seven weeks in advance of the present time, to vote on a bill that has been before the Senate for nearly six weeks, I confess I think we would better proceed to consider the bill and vote on it, unless it shall be displaced by some other measure. That is the feeling I have about it, and I say it in entire good nature, and certainly not for the purpose of depriving any Senator of any right that he could ask for, either under the rules or by way of courtesy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I fully accord to the Senator every disposition to be courteous, as he always is. I hardly think, however, that it is in harmony with the Senator's usual character for courtesy and a universal observance of it to make this point right in the middle of a speech. Now, if the Senator will give notice that after to-day he will seek to enforce the consideration of the regular order, that would be entirely characteristic of the usual consideration of the Senator. But it is not usual that such a drastic step should be taken while a Senator is on the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have not served here for fourteen years to be ignorant of the fact that a speech on a resolution always has the right of way in this body. All know that. I recognize that fact. It will be recognized to-day beyond a doubt. But, nevertheless, I do feel that the Senate ought to be willing, certainly in the near future, and I will make this request again in a day or two, to fix a time to vote on the bill. There are other very important matters coming before the Senate. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is discussing a matter which, while it is not directly before the Senate, will be here doubtless in the near future for serious consideration, and other very important questions will be here.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if agreeable to the Senators who are on their feet, that the unfinished business shall be laid aside until the Senator from Georgia concludes his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say to the Senator before that is done that I do not think he will expedite this bill by pressing it unseemly, which I think his proposition to go ahead now is. This bill has been before the Senate, it is true, for several weeks. Every Senator is quite aware that there has been no intimation that the bill was to be pressed rapidly. There are a great many other things before the Senate of more importance than this bill, and at least entitled to a few days' notice.

If the Senator proposes to press the bill and wants to press it to-day, he will find some one to speak on it without any doubt, and to-morrow. I think the bill is one which needs very serious discussion. I think on the question raised by the Senator from Florida, unless the eighth section is stricken out, it ought to be the end of the bill.

The Senator says the Senate may go on and discuss a question of this kind. I simply want to challenge that statement. Mr. President, a revenue bill can not originate in this body, and it is a breach of the privilege of the House of Representatives for this body to consider it for a moment. Courtesy requires, whenever we are satisfied that it comes within the prohibition of the Constitution, that we shall cease discussing the question. Of course the Senator can get rid of that question by striking out the eighth section. When he does that he will materially narrow the debate.

That is all I want to say. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, "the Senator from New Hampshire" accepts with due humility the lecture the Senator from Colorado has delivered to him. It is not unusual.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator will allow me to say there is no lecture about it. I am simply contending for what I think is the right of those who do not believe in this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. TELLER. I can scarcely submit to any castigation from the Senator from New Hampshire on a subject of this kind. I have been here quite as long as he has.

Mr. GALLINGER. Longer.

Mr. TELLER. I think I am quite as courteous as he is, and I am prepared to discuss this question when the time comes; but I will discuss it in my own time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator from Colorado will recall the fact that when the question as to the constitutionality of a certain provision in the bill was first raised I said that an amendment would be offered to this part of the bill, which, in my opinion—it may not be well founded—would get rid of this constitutional contention. We have not had an opportunity to do that as yet. It can be done at any session of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, this is not surprising to me. I know that the Senate always deliberates, and deliberates in its own way, and I presume it will do so in connection with this bill, but I will suggest to the Senate that if the same course shall be pursued regarding all the other great measures that will come before the Senate it is not likely that we shall vote on any of them before next November. There are a great many questions coming here. With that observation, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside until the Senator from Georgia concludes his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CLAY resumed his speech on the resolution in reference to the regulation of railroad rates, submitted by him on the 18th instant. After having spoken for about half an hour,

Mr. LONG. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Georgia what provision he would favor in the law to compel the carrier to put into effect the orders of the Commission?

Mr. CLAY. I have not critically examined the various bills which we have before us. I understand that there are many bills pending here in the Senate. I would provide that the rates fixed by the Commission should be presumed to be reasonable and just, and I would provide a penalty for the failure to carry out the rates fixed by the Commission. I would provide that the Commission should have power to compel the railroads to carry out those rates, and I would give the particular road the right to test that question in court, so as to determine whether or not the rate was reasonable and just.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAY. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to say a word, Mr. President, about the matter suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] in reference to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce their orders. I had the honor to introduce in the earlier days of the session a bill giving to the Commission the power to make certain orders and providing severe penalties for the failure of the railways to obey the orders, and, in addition to that, providing for equity proceedings by mandamus or otherwise in the circuit court of the United States to compel the railway company involved in the controversy to obey the orders of the Commission.

I noticed in a newspaper printed in a neighboring city a report sent out from here by Mr. Angus McSween, who, I think, is a reporter officially representing his paper in the Senate, in which he makes what I regard as a stupid, uncalled-for, and libelous attack, not only upon me, but upon practically the whole Senate. I ask the Secretary to read the portion of the article which I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Secretary will read the article slowly, so that we may get the essence of it.

The Secretary read as follows:

[By Angus McSween.]

WASHINGTON, January 21, 1906.

Discovery of a "snake" in the Dolliver railroad-rate bill, the author of which is now posing as the most energetic supporter of the President's rate-regulation policy in the United States Senate, has served to reveal the eloquent Senator from Iowa in an entirely new and not a pleasing light.

If it be true that DOLLIVER, for all his professions, is but another wolf in sheep's clothing, striving by means of a trick to so emasculate the proposed railroad legislation that it will amount to nothing, then it is impossible to tell if the President's plans have any real supporters in the Senate, or if it is possible to obtain from the present Congress more than a mere step in the direction of railroad reform.

The provision in the Dolliver bill which has aroused the indignation of the honest reformers in the Senate and House declares that if any of the railroads fail to comply with the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, when that Commission shall have established a reasonable rate, the Commission or the shipper concerned may, by petition, take the matter into the courts, and the courts are authorized to make a complete investigation of all the questions at issue, and decide if the order of the Commission has been reasonable and lawful, and to prescribe methods by which such order may be enforced.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, a large amount of printed matter, possibly two columns, follows what I have marked, all of it libelous and nearly all of it stupid. I have chosen to deal with this part of it because I have felt that it might not be wise to allow a report like that, affecting a bill pending here, to be circulated without at least calling public attention to its entire want of foundation.

So far as personal attacks upon me or other members of the Senate are concerned, I do not feel any pressure, either of inclination or of duty, to deal with them. It is a favorite maxim of mine that if a man's moral character is not sufficient to refute such accusations and take care of them, nothing that he can say would add to his defense. But it is of public importance that a criticism, such as the one which has just been read, should be exposed on the instant.

It is true that section 4 of the bill which I had the honor to introduce here does give the Commission the power to take its orders into a court of equity in order to secure a mandatory injunction for their enforcement; but it is not true that that constitutes any weakness in the provisions which the bill makes for their enforcement. The bill gives power to the Commission to make a variety of orders—orders for rates, orders to cease and desist from violations of the law, and orders for reparation or damages for overcharges which may have occurred.

So far as the orders for the establishment of a maximum rate are concerned, the purpose of the bill is to make the orders self-executory by setting against their violation, against the failure of the corporations to observe them, serious penalties, namely, $5,000 per day for every day's failure to observe them; but in order to cover the case of orders not involving the subject of rates, and possibly a case where the railroad might prefer to defy the order and fail to observe it, taking its chances on the Government's being able to collect the penalty, the bill also provides, not for the purpose of nullifying its provisions, but for the purpose of making them more effective, that the Commission may take its orders into a court of equity and secure a mandamus requiring the railroads to obey them. It does not give the railroads the right to go into a court of equity, but by express language limits the jurisdiction of that court in this proceeding, not to the substance and merit and reasonableness of the order, but to the fact whether a lawful order has been made and whether the corporation is in disobedience of it.

Now, I do not feel as much duty to defend that clause in the bill as I might if I had not borrowed it practically verbatim from the bill which was sent to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Commission having borrowed it in substance from the existing law. The clause was put into the bill of the Interstate Commerce Commission because, in the unanimous judgment of that Commission, it enabled them in case their orders were defied to take them into a court of equity and secure a mandatory injunction for obedience to them. Instead of injuring the law, it was important to secure in extreme cases effective obedience to its orders in case the corporations were disposed to disobey and to defy them. I took the section on the subject substantially as drawn in the Interstate Commerce Commission bill, conforming its phraseology to the language of the present law, and put it into the measure which I had the honor to introduce here, because my judgment agreed with theirs that it was necessary to complete the power of the Commission over the cases brought within their jurisdiction by the proposed measure. So that what I say now is not said for the purpose of defending my moral character, but for the purpose of exposing a stupidity the like of which I have never before seen approached in the gallery in which the representatives of the American press sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, if I can find where I left off, I will resume and complete my remarks in a few minutes. What we ought to do is to provide that all rates shall be reasonable and just, and then we ought to empower the Commission to find what rates are reasonable and just and to enforce its findings.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] asked me something about how they would be enforced. I believe the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] provides in his bill that the failure to carry out the rates fixed by the Commission shall be a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not less than two thousand nor more than twenty thousand dollars.

I do not desire to discuss the merits of any bill at present. I simply desire to contend that for ten years the Commission has been exercising power to hear complaints, exercising power to pass upon the differences between shippers and railroads; and the reports show that in 69 cases, I believe, out of 168 the rates fixed by the roads were reversed and decreased, and the railroads acquiesced in the findings of the Commission.

No great harm was done to the people of the United States while the Interstate Commerce Commission exercised this power. The Commission to-day is an ornamental rather than a useful body. The Commission can examine into rates now on complaint, but it can simply find that they are unreasonable, and the railroads are not bound to pay any attention to the matter. I believe that unless you empower the Commission to investigate rates, to fix rates that are reasonable and just, and to enforce its findings you had better repeal the law creating the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, the debates of Congress will show that when the law was passed creating the Interstate Commerce Commission and defining its powers Congress intended to give to the Commission the power then to say what was a reasonable and just rate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was a member of the Senate at the time, and the exact opposite of what the Senator says was the understanding, so far as I know, of every member of this body.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island is wide-awake and keeps up with the business of the Senate, but I am sure, if the Senator will read the debates of the House and of the Senate, he will reach the conclusion that I am correct.

Mr. ALDRICH. I mean so far as their intentions were expressed in the discussion.

Mr. CLAY. I have myself read the debates.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who then had charge of the bill, stated in definite and set terms that there was no intention on the part of Congress or of the committee or of himself to give any rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. CLAY. The debates show——

Mr. ALDRICH. And nothing was said in the Senate by any member of the committee or by any member of the Senate to the contrary, and I challenge the Senator to produce any evidence anywhere that there was.

Mr. CLAY. I will address the Senate at a later day, and I will produce speech after speech made upon the floor of the House and of the Senate stating that the bill provided that all rates should be reasonable and just; that it empowered the Commission to enforce every provision of the law, and clearly carried the right to investigate and declare what were reasonable and just rates.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the bill in terms said that all rates should be reasonable and just. That, of course, is not and can not be a subject of contention on the part of anybody; but that the Congress went beyond that and gave, or intended to give, the Interstate Commerce Commission any power to fix rates is not within the range of possibility. Those who were members of the Senate at that time, as I was, and my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and other Senators around me were, had a clear understanding on this subject.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the Senator knows, if he has investigated the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the Commission did exercise this power for the period of ten years——

Mr. ALDRICH. I know, but——

Mr. CLAY. One moment. And the Senator knows well that the Commission heard various complaints of shippers as against the roads charging excessive rates, that the Commission said the rates were excessive, that the Commission reduced the rates, and that the roads acquiesced in the findings of the Commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is undoubtedly true that the Interstate Commerce Commission throughout its entire history has been hearing charges and claims of the nature suggested by the Senator from Georgia, and they undoubtedly have had an effect upon the railroads in a great many cases. The Commission have been performing a very proper function in that regard, but in the very first case where they undertook to fix rates, which reached the Supreme Court of the United States, there was a prompt decision that they had no such power and never had had such power.

Mr. CLAY. It is true that the Commission exercised this power for about ten years. I know what I am talking about. I have read its reports, and I have read the cases that the Commission had under consideration, and the Senator will find that there were more than fifty cases where rates were reduced, and the Senator will find that the roads acquiesced. The Senator——

Mr. ALDRICH. The roads have been acquiescing.

Mr. CLAY. One moment. The Senator will find that that question went to the Supreme Court in 162 United States, and the Supreme Court decided that there was nothing in the act empowering the Commission to make rates. Up to that time that power was exercised by the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to both Senators.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was merely about to say that cases involving charges of extortionate rates and all the other questions affecting transportation in this country have continually been heard by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the railroads, in case their judgment agreed with that of the Commission, have often followed the Interstate Commerce Commission in its suggestion and recommendation. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been discharging that function up to the present time, and there is no question about its right.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that my information is that since that decision was rendered the Interstate Commerce Commission has heard complaints in regard to excessive rates. But all it can do is simply to find that the rates fixed by the roads are unreasonable, and then can write to the roads recommending that the rates be reduced. But the Commission does not attempt to exercise the power to compel the roads to put in operation rates so reduced since that decision was made. It would be futile; it would be a useless——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator does not want to be understood as saying that the Commission does not now frequently prosecute suits to restrain exactions?

Mr. CLAY. So far as that is concerned, as I understand the common law it could be done under the common law without any commission. Under the common law the shipper could go into the court without any statute law on the subject and file a bill in equity, setting forth that the rate charged is excessive, exorbitant, and unreasonable, and under the common law the courts were empowered to enjoin the enforcement of a rate of that kind. That was true, as I understand the law, before the Commission was created. The existence of the Commission did not change the law in that particular, and certainly now, I think, the Commission, where it finds the rates to be unreasonable and excessive as against the shipper, can go into the courts and enjoin its enforcement.

The Commission ought to have the right to hear evidence as to the cost of the construction of the railroad; how much watered stock there is, if any, in the railway company. The Commission ought to know how much it costs to operate the road, how much business the road is doing, and the expense of operating the road; and when the Commission ascertains those facts it ought to fix a rate that is reasonable and just to the shipper and the road, and there ought to be a penalty to enable the Commissioners to enforce the rate found to be just and reasonable, and, in my judgment, that rate ought to be in force until set aside by the courts in a proper way.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Georgia, who is always wise, to say earlier in his remarks that the rates ought to be remunerative. He has just made an allusion to one of the salient facts, or what is considered one of the salient facts in the railroad problem—the question of overcapitalization, watered stock. Does the Senator think that in deciding whether a rate is remunerative these questions ought to be considered?

Mr. CLAY. I do. I think every question the determination of which will tend to do justice between the road and the shipper ought to be considered.

Mr. ALDRICH. What part——

Mr. CLAY. The Commission ought to know the actual cost of the road, and the Commission ought to know the actual operating expenses of the road.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator mean the cost of replacing it or the original cost?

Mr. CLAY. All those things ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to make a suggestion in answer to the question of the Senator from Rhode Island. The Supreme Court in the Nebraska case (169 U. S. Rep.) said that in determining what would be just remuneration for the service of a carrier they would take into consideration only the actual cost of the road, and if there were fictitious values placed or fictitious stock issued it should be excluded.

Mr. BAILEY. Not the actual cost, but the actual value.

Mr. FULTON. The actual value. They went on then, qualifying the proposition of actual cost, to say, Suppose a road had been built at a time when it cost a great deal more to construct than it would to construct a similar road at the present time; it might be proper to consider merely the actual value. But, at any rate, the court laid down the rule that fictitious values should not be considered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was more or less familiar with what the Supreme Court has decided; but the Senator from Georgia is making the first set speech that has been made upon the side of the question which appeals to popular opinion, and I assume——

Mr. CLAY. One moment.

Mr. ALDRICH. And I assume——

Mr. CLAY. One moment right here. I want to answer that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I assume——

Mr. CLAY. The Senator does not know me if he thinks my purpose is to appeal to popular opinion or to do other than what is right as between the roads and the shippers.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, I am sure of that. But, as I was about to say, the Senator from Georgia, I suppose, can be taken more or less as the representative of people other than himself, because he is discussing this question from the standpoint of those who believe the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given power to fix rates. I was trying to find out what his opinion is upon this question—not what the Supreme Court has decided, but his opinion as the representative of people who believe in this legislation.

I should like to know whether he thinks either the Commission or the courts ought to take into consideration watered stock—overcapitalization—and whether dividends should or should not be paid upon it, and whether the present cost of building the road or the present value of the road is to be taken into consideration, in his opinion, in fixing a rate which is remunerative, because all these are not mere idle questions. They are practical questions of the very highest importance. He is here as a representative, and I should like to know what his opinion is, and not what has been the opinion of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CLAY. In fixing the rates, in my opinion, the Interstate Commerce Commission should take into consideration the actual value of the roads at the time they are considering that question. Some roads, by reason of their surroundings, are making more money than others. They should also take into consideration the question of the cost of operating the road and the net earnings of the road. You are bound to consider all those questins in fixing a rate, and the presumption is that an intelligent commission will be bound to consider those questions and would consider every circumstance.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has just stated that it would be the duty of the Commission to take into consideration not only the value and cost of the road, but also the expenses of operation. I should like to know whether he would expect the Commission to go by detail into the expenses of operation and look after the employment of officials, the salaries paid them, and so forth, and so on, and to what extent——

Mr. KEAN. And labor.

Mr. FORAKER. And to what extent his investigation would go. Is the Commission to determine whether the salary paid to the president and the wages of the employees are right and proper and to be approved? Is all that necessary in determining the operating expenses? I only ask for information.

Mr. CLAY. I should take into consideration, in considering this question, every fact and circumstance going to show the cost of construction—the value of the road, the expenses and net earnings—everything that would, if I were a Commissioner, give me a proper idea as to what rate the road ought to charge in order to pay expenses and a fair and reasonable dividend, and then give the citizen a fair and reasonable rate.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to be personal, but take the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad, a great corporation, officered by great men, giving all their time to it. Would the Senator say how much salary should be paid to the president and vice-president, and so on, and determine the wages of the engineers, the conductors, the firemen, etc.?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I am asking only for information.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that that question is merely befogging the real issue. The question in all such cases will be, what are the reasonable expenses of construction; what are the expenses of operating the road? An exigency might arise where, for the sake of making a case in court, a road might pad their expense list, as we know is sometimes done in other cases, for the sake of making a bigger showing. In such a case would the Senator from Ohio say, "You shall not investigate that padding."

Mr. FORAKER. No; I am not saying anything about it. I am trying to get information. The Senator from Georgia was telling us what the Commission would have to consider, and he said the Commission would have to consider operating expenses. I want to know whether he is going into these items. These are all items of operating expense. I want to get the benefit of his idea.

Mr. NELSON. The Commission will go into the items or not, according to the facts presented. If it became material to go into the items—if the investigator, whether a master in chancery in an equity proceeding or the Interstate Commerce Commission or anybody else, became convinced that the expense account was in any way padded—manifestly, as a matter of justice and equity, they would have a right to consider the details.

Mr. FORAKER. I should think, if we entered upon that policy, it would not only be their right, but their duty. I want to clear up whatever of fog there is hanging about this question, in order that we may get the length and breadth of this matter.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. No, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Only one more question.

Mr. CLAY. I will yield this time, after which I must proceed with my argument.

Mr. ALDRICH. As we are having an official exposition of this plan, I think it important that we should know something about the details of it. I should like to ask the Senator to answer this question, How he would make a practical application of the general scheme of remunerative rates to a single road, say between Atlanta and Boston?

Mr. CLAY. That is a matter which I do not care to discuss now. I may discuss it later on. That question involves the merits of the different bills, and I can not now undertake it. I rose to-day for the purpose of discussing the question of the power of Congress to provide that rates shall be just and reasonable, and then delegating the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission—the right to find what rate is reasonable and just.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was in hopes that some kind of a scheme, some practical way——

Mr. CLAY. We have before us nearly as many bills as we have Senators, and I do not at this time wish to go into a discussion of the different bills upon this occasion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will wait.

Mr. CLAY. Let me say this: I have not heard a single Senator who opposes giving the Commission this power suggest a remedy. Will the Senators who oppose giving the Commission this power——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. One minute. Will the Senators who oppose giving the Commission this power say that the railroads shall fix their own rates through their traffic managers, and that those rates shall be final and that the citizen—the individual shipper—shall have no place to go and have his complaint heard? What do you want with an Interstate Commerce Commission, that costs the people of the United States money every year, simply to investigate and find that a rate is unreasonable and then do nothing? Why not repeal your law unless your are going to make your Commission effective?

Let me say to you now that the public sentiment in favor of governmental ownership is growing every day. I am not in favor of it, but unless you check it by governmental regulation you will watch it grow and continue to grow.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Just one moment. I am not in favor of it. I recognize the fact that the vast number of employees engaged in the building and construction and operation of railroads would be largely under the control and influence of the party in power in the event that governmental ownership should ever prevail, and it would result in the particular party in power holding the Government for all time to come. It is not best for this Government to be under the control of any particular party for too long a time. Parties closely divided, discussing issues, and holding each other to a strict account are necessary to the preservation of American institutions, and I am unconditionally opposed to Government ownership of railroads. An election took place not long since in the city of New York, where Mr. HEARST came within a few thousand votes of being elected mayor of that city. I am not one of his followers, and never have been, but, Senators, he almost won that race because he was in favor of municipal ownership.

I tell you to-day if you check the will of the people, if you fail to give the citizen a tribunal where his rights can be heard, if you allow the roads to continue to fix their rates, giving the citizen no tribunal where he can be heard, the American people will wake up and be heard, and a dangerous policy may be put in operation in this country. I say that wise, conservative, and safe legislation on the line I am advocating at this time, in my opinion, is of vast importance to the people of the United States.

Mr. President, who has suggested a different remedy? You tell me that the courts can make rates. It is true that the courts can declare that a given rate is unreasonable and enjoin it, but that simply applies to that particular case. It does not operate in the future. The highest court in our land has decided that the courts have no power to prescribe rates that shall take place in the future. Whether or not the courts can decide that a rate is unreasonable and at the same time announce what is a reasonable rate, is a question of grave doubt, and upon that I am not ready to give an opinion.

The Attorney-General has considered this question in every aspect, and I am frank to say that he ranks as one of the ablest Attorney-Generals we have ever had. I have read his special report to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, of which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is chairman. It is an able exposition of the law upon this subject, and he recites authority after authority, and he reaches the conclusion, beyond a question, that this power can be delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission. No sensible man wants to cripple railroad property. I have all my public life been friendly to the railroads, but at the same time let us do justice to the American shippers.

I was reading the other day the testimony of one of the Commissioners before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, and it startled me, and with the permission of the Senate I will read it, and then I will conclude my remarks. I wish to call attention to what Mr. Prouty said. During the year, before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, Mr. Prouty, one of the Commissioners, was asked the question:

Should the Interstate Commerce Commission be given the power, in addition to what it already has, to investigate complaints and determine whether or not an existing rate was reasonable and just, and to enforce its findings?

Mr. Prouty, replying to the question, said:

I do not understand that the Commission at the present time has any power in the premises. The defect in the present law is that neither the Commission nor the court nor anybody else has any power to say, with respect to the future, whether a rate is reasonable or unreasonable, whether a discrimination is due or undue; and therefore you have no power to make any order in the premises.

Senator CULLOM asked the question:

Well, ought you to have this power?

His reply was simply this:

I have said it a great many times—that there must be, and especially in view of the combined railway influence at the present time, some tribunal somewhere which has power to judge between the railway and the public. I think the railways should make their own rates.

So do I.

I think they should be allowed to develop their own business. But—

Says Mr. Prouty—

I say this, that there must be some tribunal somewhere which can determine whether the railroad has so used its property as to destroy my property. If a railroad, having the absolute monopoly to fix rates, imposes upon me an unjust and unreasonable rate, it takes my property. If a railroad, having power, imposes a discrimination which shuts up my coal mines or shuts down my mill. It takes my property. Now, there must be a tribunal somewhere which can judge between me and the railroad—which can say whether the railroad is using or has used its property in a legitimate way with respect to my rights and property rights. As a matter of fact, I go a little further—

Says Judge Prouty—

I say the only way the public can be protected is by acting directly upon the railroad rates. The thing which hurts is the rate. The thing which must be acted upon is the rate. In some way or other you must revise the action of the traffic manager. If you can do this by a court, all right. As I understand the Constitution of the United States, it can not be done by a court. A court has no power and can be given no power to determine a rate for the future. Therefore, you must bestow that power upon some commission.

Mr. Prouty says competition has ceased. All of the great lines of railroad are under one system. He further said, illustrating the extent to which railroad operation has been unified in the United States:

I had occasion the other day to tell one of my clerks in the office to make me up a statement which would show certain facts with reference to certain great systems of railroads in the United States. I gave to him six systems. If I remember correctly, the six systems were the Vanderbilt system, the Pennsylvania system, the Gould system, the Harriman system, the Hill system, and the Rock Island system. I said to him: "You take the statistical returns of the railway to the Interstate Commerce Commission and tell me from those statistical returns how many miles of railroads are controlled by those six systems." He did so; and it turned out that of all the railroads in the United States about 55 per cent were embraced in those systems. But, gentlemen—that did not express it, for the simple reason that the railroads which were embraced within those systems do so much more business and were so much more important than the railroads left out of the systems.

He said two-thirds of the railway capitalization of the United States is embraced in those systems, and 62 per cent of the railway gross rates of the United States are embraced systems. Says Mr. Prouty:

That does not fully express it. The men who are potential in these systems are potential in other railroads in the United States, and competition between the railroads has practically ceased, and if it has not ceased entirely, it will do so in the near future.

What are the American people to do if the railroads are allowed to fix their own rates and the shippers have nowhere to go to complain of their wrongs? Who shall be the judge as to whether or not the rates are reasonable and impartial? The roads represent one side, the shippers the other. It may be possible that the shippers want more than their just dues, and the same may be said of the roads. We are all selfish, looking after our own interest. Then let us have a broad-minded, intelligent, industrious Interstate Commerce Commission, clothed with the power to hear all complaints and to decide what rates are reasonable and just, and give it the power to enforce its findings, to settle the differences between the shippers and the roads. Then you may rest assured that substantial justice in every instance will be done between the roads and the people. This is all any honest man ought to ask.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I was greatly interested in the impassioned prayer of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] that we should join him in saving the Democratic party and the country from Mr. HEARST and his teachings. The method which he points out to us and asks us to adopt is to pass a measure which Mr. HEARST says he originated, and which he introduced, as I understand, about four years ago in the House of Representatives, in almost the very exact terms of the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. I agree with a great many things——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. HEARST introduced a bill, but not along the lines on which I have been speaking.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. CLAY. He will find that Mr. HEARST introduced a bill providing that the Commission should originate the rates. That is my recollection.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to suggest that the lines along which the Senator from Georgia has been speaking are the lines laid down by the Republican President?

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that; but as I understand Mr. HEARST'S contention——

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. ALDRICH. Wait a moment.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator will permit me to supplement——

Mr. ALDRICH. No. The Senator will wait just a moment.

Mr. CLAY. All right.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. HEARST claims, as I understand, that he introduced a bill in the last Congress, or the Congress before that, in almost identical terms with the suggestions now made by the Senator from Georgia, and I have presented to the Senate petitions from my own State commending the Republican party for having adopted and indorsed, as they claimed, the plan and scheme Mr. HEARST devised several years ago.

Mr. CLAY. I think I know that I am correct——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a matter about which——

Mr. CLAY. And I am afraid the Senator from Rhode Island has not read the bill which Mr. HEARST introduced.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have read it.

Mr. CLAY. My recollection is, and I have been informed it is correct beyond a question, that Mr. HEARST'S bill provided that the Commission should fix all interstate rates on its own motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. There may have been——

Mr. CLAY. I want to say to the Senator, in reply to what he has said, that I have been arguing on the lines the Senator says the President has recommended to us; that the President has adopted our platform on that line—the platform the last Democratic convention adopted in St. Louis.

Mr. ALDRICH. You mean Mr. HEARST and yourself by "our?"

Mr. CLAY. I think the President's message and letter to Congress are on the line of the platform adopted by the Democratic convention in St. Louis, and I want to say to the Senator that if he will read the opinions of the Attorney-General, the legal representative of this Government, he will find they are on the same lines on which I have been arguing for the short time I have been on the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that, but I think the Senator will have great difficulty in destroying whatever credit may belong to Mr. HEARST—whether it is a matter of credit or not is something on which there may be differences of opinion—for having very early presented this panacea for all the transportation evils from which the country is suffering.

I was very greatly surprised that the Senator from Georgia should appeal to this side of the Chamber to save the Democratic party from the inevitable——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will.

Mr. BACON. Then he recognizes the fact that the President of the United States got this plan from Mr. HEARST?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know whether he did or not. I only know what Mr. HEARST has been claiming. I do not suppose that Mr. HEARST or any of his friends had a patent on this policy. I do not know who originated it, but I was surprised that the Senator from Georgia should urge, as an argument in its favor, that he was trying to save this country from Mr. HEARST and his teachings, when he has availed himself of that which Mr. HEARST has advocated in a general way from the beginning of his political life.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that, so far as I have been able to gather from the feeling of Senators, this can not be made a party question, and it ought to rise above partisanship.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the reason why I was surprised at the appeal the Senator from Georgia was making.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think the Senator from Georgia made an appeal along that line. He was merely speaking in general terms, that municipal ownership, which would be the predecessor of national ownership, is a specter that we all see down the road somewhere, and that we might stop it if we would be rational and patriotic.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Georgia to say that the principal reason, or at least one of the great reasons, why we should promptly adopt this policy was that we might be saved from Mr. HEARST.

Mr. TILLMAN. From national ownership.

Mr. ALDRICH. Whatever it is.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps I did.

Mr. CLAY. I did not say any such thing. I said that the popular feeling in favor of Government ownership was growing, as was shown in the mayoralty race where one of the leading candidates was in favor of municipal ownership. I distinctly said that in order to save the country from the idea of governmental ownership Government regulation was necessary and proper, and that I believe it to be right and proper outside of that question.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I have been trying to get an opportunity——

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that it will expedite business if Senators will wait for recognition by the Chair. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. I have been trying for a good while to do it, and I think that now is a good place.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator, Does he contend that he has not asked me a question before?

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, I have asked the Senator several questions, but not anything like as many as I have been disposed to ask him. But I did not want to interrupt him. I do not want the Senator to think that because I have been sitting here listening in silence to most of his speech that I believe there is very much in it. He will therefore permit me to say I do not.

I understood the Senator to say that he favors this proposition, among other reasons, because it will save us from Government ownership. I wanted to ask the Senator right here whether he can tell us of any man in all this country who is in favor of Government ownership who is not in favor of this proposition?

Mr. CLAY. I beg to say that I have never been close to the political party in favor of Government ownership or the public men who advocated Government ownership. I do not know how those who favor Government ownership feel in regard to Government regulation. I may be mistaken about it, but I believe that 75 per cent of the American people are in favor of clothing the Interstate Commerce Commission with power to investigate complaints and to fix reasonable and just rates.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Now I will yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island and all other Senators know how much I deprecate making a partisan issue over any question. On this side we give evidence of our willingness to forego party advantage when we permit a Republican President to take bodily from our national platform an important plank and make it as his recommendation to Congress without a syllable of complaint. We manifest not only a willingness but an eagerness to vote for it, and it comes with bad grace from that side when a Senator on this side espouses the policy of the President for a distinguished Republican leader to rebuke him by an allusion to a Democrat who happens not to be popular with the Senator from Rhode Island or those who think with him. That particular Democrat may or may not be popular on this side of the Chamber. Some of his views are undoubtedly rejected. Some of his views, I have no doubt, would receive a cordial support.

I doubt if there is any man in this country claiming to be a Democrat and of sufficient prominence to make it worth while to consider what he says or does who does not advocate some measure acceptable to all of us. One measure might be acceptable to gentlemen on the other side, another measure might be acceptable to those on this side, and it would be no just ground of criticism from us against you or from you against us that on a particular measure he concurs with us.

But I rose merely to ask, in a spirit of absolute nonpartisanship, why the Senator from Rhode Island and his associates can not agree upon a bill substantially in the very words of the President's message? That the Senator from Rhode Island does not accept the wisdom of a Republican President is not strange to us who know the Senator or who know the President. The Senator from Rhode Island is nothing if not conservative. The President of the United States is nothing if not emotional. It is utterly impossible to conceive two characters so wholly dissimilar as the Senator from Rhode Island and the President of the United States. And yet I must assume that both the President of the United States and the Senator from Rhode Island want to do equal and exact justice both to the railroads and to the shipper.

Now, if the Senator from Rhode Island is willing to maintain before the Senate and in the presence of the country that a bill along the lines so earnestly and so ably advocated by the Senator from Georgia will not do justice, then I recommend that he settle his quarrel within his own party, beginning this adjustment with the President of the United States himself.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I regret as much as the Senator from Texas possibly can the injection of partisanship into this discussion. I certainly am not the guilty party.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are the very man.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was the Senator from Georgia who begged us to save the country from a leading Democrat whose position to-day is so overshadowing that there is hardly a man on this side of the Chamber or that who does not believe either he or Mr. Bryan will lead the Democratic party in the next national campaign. I deprecate, I say again, as much as the Senator from Texas can that the discussion has taken any such direction. I say we have had fully shown the spirit of the Senator from Georgia, which led him for reasons of his own to bring into this discussion a personality which might be used, in his judgment, to frighten this side and that from doing what they think might otherwise be their duty. But that is not what I arose to say. The Senator from Georgia——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has been good enough to tell us who will be the Democratic nominee at the next Presidential election. Will he now be good enough to tell us who is to be the Republican nominee?

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no such consensus of opinion in Republican circles as there is in Democratic, I am happy to say.

Mr. BAILEY. We are not altogether a harmonious family, but the only difference between us and you is that we speak our differences a little louder than you do. The differences in the Republican party are to-day more violent than they are with us. I do not invite you to discuss those differences in public; but having volunteered to inform the country in advance whom we would nominate—and I am free to say that if we knew what you wanted us to do we would be certain to do the other thing if we are rational—it seems to me the Senator, who professes to know so much about our party, ought to know something about his own, and I should like to have him state what he thinks of the publication in this morning's paper that the President is to be a candidate for a third term upon a platform "against the money power."

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there was just one serious point in the speech of the Senator from Georgia which I can not overlook. He states that the entire railroad interests of the country are controlled by six different groups of interests.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I read the testimony of an Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; that is right. Now, if I understand the logic of his argument, it is that there is but very little competition now existing in rates or facilities for transportation in the United States, on account of the fact that all the railroad business of the country is concentrated in a few hands. Now, what does he propose as a remedy? He proposes to consolidate every mile of railroad in the United States in one combination. He proposes to give into the hands of a commission arbitrary power to fix every railroad rate in the United States and to destroy beyond any power of recovery every vestige of competition; to create, in other words, one great railroad combination.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator yield to me right there?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; let me finish the sentence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island refuses to yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will in just a minute. He proposes to put in place of six great influential railroad combinations one monster combination, under Government control and Government regulation, with no power to change rates on the part of anybody after they are once established by the Commission and ratified by the courts. He proposes to destroy the last vestige by law in the name of Democracy and in the name of the people. He proposes to wipe out what there is left of possible competition in transportation, and by what would be an infamous project give one commission, without appeal and without review except upon some unimportant collateral questions, the arbitrary power to fix rates, not alone for the railroads, but for the shipper, for you and me, and every man in the country who would thus be made to bow down to this monster who would have in its clutch the great business interests of this country, put there by your votes—you who speak or pretend to speak in the name of Democracy and the people.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island has said that I stated in my argument that I desire to place arbitrary power in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates, and without any appeal from the decisions of that Commission, whether those rates were reasonable or not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; I did not say quite that.

Mr. CLAY. I think I heard the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said the power to fix rates which when once approved by the courts could not possibly be changed.

Mr. CLAY. Why, Mr. President, the Senator knows well that the Interstate Commerce Commission during the ten years it exercised that power frequently changed the rates the Commission had already made. No Commission ought to be permitted to make a rate that shall stand for all time. Different circumstances may arise; different conditions may arise; and the Commission ought to be empowered to lower or increase the rate if different conditions should arise. Now, let us see——

Mr. ALDRICH. But——

Mr. CLAY. Let me get through. Mr. President, all I propose to do is simply to say to the Commission, "You shall do right;" that the Commission shall say to the railroads, "You shall do right. You shall make reasonable and just rates. If you do, they stand; if not, they will be set aside." And, Mr. President, the Attorney-General has joined the Democratic party on that line. The Republican party has joined the Democratic party on that line. Convention after convention, chamber of commerce after chamber of commerce, has joined the Democratic party on that line. But what says the Senator from Rhode Island? Railroads draw out of the pockets of the people $2,000,000,000 for passenger fares and freights every year. Shall the roads continue to fix the rates and the shippers have nowhere to go to make their complaints and redress their wrongs? Must the shipper be bound by the rates fixed by the roads, whether reasonable or unreasonable, and will the Republican party leave the law in this condition? Is that the position of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. I made no such suggestion.

Mr. CLAY. I am not through yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. CLAY. I will yield in one minute.

Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island says that notwithstanding the fact that the railroads exercise the right of eminent domain, that they can condemn our homes and our farms, and that is right and proper, and notwithstanding the fact that they get their life from the State and the Government, he denies to Congress the right to give to any tribunal the right to hear the complaint of the shipper, even though the rate fixed by the roads may be ever so unreasonable and unjust. He says, "Be silent; stand right where you are." He has offered no remedy. Mr. President, he has said that the roads ought to fix their own rates, and whether reasonable or unreasonable these rates ought to stand. He suggests no remedy. He belongs to that part of his party that believes in letting well enough alone, and says there shall be no interference; that a citizen shall have nowhere to go if the roads confiscate his property; if they destroy private industries, then the citizen is without any remedy. The railroads doubtless will agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, but I doubt if the American people will approve his doctrine.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Georgia in the last ten minutes has been undertaking to express my opinion, when I have carefully abstained from expressing one single suggestion as to my own position. I have not stated, directly or indirectly, what my judgment or idea is in regard to this subject, and his statement in that connection is entirely a figment of his own imagination. I have made no statement of any kind as to my own views about this matter.

I was trying to conduct, I trust modestly, an inquiry into the arguments presented by the Senator from Georgia to test their validity and their logic, and to make such suggestions in connection with them as seemed to me to be wise. I am a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee and in a certain sense a judge with reference to all these questions. I will speak sooner or later and will be able to show the Senate, both by vote and voice, what my position is. In the meantime I shall ask the Senator from Georgia to excuse me if I do not make him my mouthpiece, and do not accept his utterances as official as far as I am concerned.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. To what measure did the Senator refer when he spoke of it as an infamous measure?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not speak about any measure as infamous. It was not a measure, but a proposition.

Mr. BACON. A distinction without a difference, I should judge.

Mr. ALDRICH. I meant a proposition which would commit to the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other commission a power to arbitrarily fix rates without any review by the courts.

Mr. BACON. That is the proposition.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I meant, one thing I understood the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] was contending for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, all right. I must have been mistaken.

Mr. CLAY. Now, the Senator understands me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question and that is with reference to the consolidation of railroads in this country. He referred to the fact that there were already six great consolidations.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was speaking of the statement of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NEWLANDS. He was speaking of one monopoly and he insisted that the effect of this would be to force all those six consolidations into one consolidation. Now, I should like to ask him whether he regards this tendency toward consolidation in the country as a good tendency, one involving a benefit to the people of the United States or one involving an injury?

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think, so far as it leads to economy in the cost of transportation and reduces the rates, it is wise and should be fostered. Whenever it absolutely prevents competition—that is, so far as competition can be suppressed—I think it is wrong.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator recognizes the fact that every combination does in some degree diminish competition, does he not?

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator therefore thinks that no combination which in the slightest degree——

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Affecting competition is wise?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not say that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well; may I ask the Senator what view he does have on that subject?

Mr. ALDRICH. Where the balance of advantages to the public outweigh the disadvantages I should say that combination should be encouraged.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who is to be the judge of that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word regarding this tendency toward consolidation. One fault, I think, with all legislation pending before Congress is that it does not assume national control of these consolidations of railroads engaged in interstate commerce through a national incorporation act, preventing those that are not and permitting those that are in the interest of the public. I recognize the fact that the economic tendency of the times, so far as transportation is concerned, is to merge the numerous railroads in this country into a few great systems; that these combinations have been beneficial to the public and to the country, resulting in better administration and in a diminution of operating expenses, and that they ought to result to the benefit of the public in the gradual reduction of rates.

I insist upon it that transportation always involves monopoly; within a sphere, either large or small, that if the Government undertook the conduct of transportation in this country it would mean a governmental monopoly; that when that transportation intrusted to private corporations it means monopoly of transportation by that corporation except at points common to two competitive lines; that it is an absolute monopoly as to every station which is not intersected by two competing lines; and we know that to-day most of the stations of the country are stations which have no competing lines. So within the sphere of their operations, except in certain towns or cities through which other independent lines run, the operation of every railroad means a practical monopoly.

We have been going on in this line of consolidation, the numerous railroads at first being consolidated into 600 operating railroads, and these finally being organized into various groups, each of them having a mileage of from 10,000 to 20,000 miles, each of them so thoroughly under the control of a single individual that the group would bear the name of the individual.

So it is that we have consolidations in this country bearing the names of Mr. Gould, of Mr. Hill, of Mr. Morgan, of Mr. Harriman, and others. The entire railroad world and the country at large recognize the fact that each one of these consolidations, each operating from one-twentieth to one-tenth of the entire railroad mileage of the country, is practically under the control of one man.

How do you propose to remedy this? By giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix rates, upon challenge of the shipper? I believe in giving it that power, but it will not meet the requirements of the situation. Consolidations themselves should be put under national control by the organization of national corporations, whose jurisdiction should be as broad as interstate commerce itself. We should not permit these consolidations to be going on, the laws of individual States issuing letters of marque to particular corporations to prey upon the people of other States.

I therefore suggest that one step in securing the proper control of the transportation of the country should be that we should legalize desirable consolidation. The existing consolidations have been effected against the law; they have been effected as a result of the irrestible economic tendency of the time. I believe that most of them have done good. But they should, in my judgment, be regulated by law, and the question of consolidation or the extent of consolidation should not be left to the judgment of individuals, with whom private profit is the controlling factor. The fault that I have to find with the existing system of consolidation is that a few individuals, possessing great wealth and power, can determine what consolidation shall take place, and can employ shrewd lawyers, who teach and instruct them how to evade the law and how to form combinations against the law. We have had one of these combinations tested in the courts, the combination covered by the Northern Securities cases, and involving pretty nearly 20,000 miles of railroad; a consolidation which, in my judgment, if effected under the sanction of law and properly controlled in its capitalization, would have been beneficial to the country.

The promoters of this consolidation sought to accomplish it against the law, against the statute of the United States forbidding it, and when it was tested the Supreme Court annulled it. I have no hesitation in saying that at least half of these great consolidations which have been effected in the country would to-day, if submitted to the courts, be dissolved under the Northern Securities decision. I believe that almost all of these combinations are to-day existing in violation of law and against the express provisions of law.

I have no hostility to combinations made under proper sanction and public control, but I object to consolidations accomplished against the restraints of the law or accomplished without proper control, either as to desirability in the public interest or as to capitalization. Therefore, I say that the nation should take up this question of the consolidation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce and, by the passage of a national incorporation act, place such consolidation of interstate roads under the control of the only sovereignty capable of dealing with the subject completely and comprehensively in the public interest.

The National Government should do this, simply because it is the only Government of all the people of the United States, and transportation affects all the people of the United States. There is not a single system of transportation which involves only the people of an individual State. Therefore the general welfare, the welfare of all the people of the United States, demands that the National Government should act upon this question, and should act now. We have our sanction under the provisions of the Constitution which give us the right to legislate for the general welfare, to legislate with reference to the national defense, into which transportation enters as a large factor, to legislate with regard to post-offices, post-roads, and the transportation of the mails, to legislate regarding interstate commerce. To-day three-fourths of our business is interstate commerce. In the Nebraska Maximum Rate Case it was pointed out by the court that only one-twentieth of the business of the roads of that State was State business, and that nineteen-twentieths of it was interstate.

So I insist, Mr. President, that this legislation ought to be entered upon by the sovereignty which represents the entire people, and that a State, an individual State, is utterly incapable of dealing with it. Yet these individuals, seeking a consolidation, seeking to carry out the irresistible tendency of the times toward the economic development of transportation, have been obliged to go to individual States in order to get their charters. To-day the State of New Jersey is the State under which the Rock Island system is controlled—the Rock Island system, with its 20,000 miles of railroad, and with not a mile of track within the State of New Jersey.

So far as the Southern States are concerned, what do we find there as the result of the war and the economic distress following? All the southern railroads having passed through foreclosures and receiverships innumerable, have been consolidated into three great systems of transportation, embracing pretty nearly 30,000 miles of road, nearly the entire mileage of the South—the Southern Railway system, with 10,000 miles; the Atlantic Coast system, with 10,000 miles, and the Illinois Central system, with about 6,000 miles. All the transportation of the South and the Gulf, instead of being under the control of local corporations, is to-day under the control of systems whose central organization is in States outside of those through which they run.

How was the Southern Railway system organized? It was organized out of the Richmond and Danville. The reorganizers who purchased it went to the legislature, and they were authorized to reorganize under whatever name the incorporators saw fit. Did the legislature confine them to the reorganization of that particular road? Oh, no; they were given unlimited power for the purchase and consolidation and lease of lines in other States. The only limitation as to capital put upon this great corporation was the sum of $350,000,000—$350,000,000 to reorganize the Richmond and Danville system, a railroad in the State of Virginia. It is very apparent by the terms of the act that the purpose was all embracing; that the intention was to accomplish the consolidation of numerous railroads, even though they were competing railroads. We have only to glance at the map to see that these numerous competing railroads were absorbed into one corporation. That corporation exists to-day, with about $180,000,000 of bonds and about $180,000,000 of stock issued, and with an unlimited authority to issue more bonds for consolidation and purchase, and to issue stock to the extent of $170,000,000 more.

I ask the Representatives here of the State of South Carolina and the Representatives of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky, into which States this great line enters, is it better for them to have such transportation system incorporated under the laws of Virginia, in whose legislation they do not share, or would it be better to have that consolidation incorporated under the laws of the United States, in whose legislation they all share through their Senators and Representatives in Congress and through a President elected by the States? Do they regard this legislation as legislation that is affecting only the welfare of the people of Virginia, or do they regard it as legislation affecting every Southern State through which this Southern Railway system passes?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Let me ask the Senator, Does he mean to assert the opinion that because Virginia gave those corporations the right to go into Kentucky, Tennessee and other States they have any rights there except such as Kentucky, Tennessee, and the other States agreed they should have?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator mean to say that the Congress of the United States can create a corporation in the District of Columbia to carry on operations in the State of Colorado, if it sees fit?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do; so far as interstate commerce is concerned. The United States can organize a corporation for the purpose of engaging in interstate commerce, and it has already done so. That question is foreclosed. The United States organized the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation which now traverses five or six States, though at the time these States were Territories. It is true that in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad the road runs from the boundary of the State of Iowa to the boundary of the State of California. That was, it is true, territory of the United States, but in the case of the Texas Pacific Railroad authority was given by Congress to that corporation, a national corporation, to build from a point in the State of Texas to a point in the State of California, passing not only through two States, but through two Territories, and that legislation has been upheld. So the United States, having authority over interstate commerce and legislating for the entire people of the United States, can form a corporation for the purpose of constructing and maintaining an interstate road.

The Senator inquires whether I contend that a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Virginia can, without the consent of the States of Georgia, of Florida, of Alabama, and of Kentucky, enter those States. I say no; but, as a matter of fact, such a corporation has entered those States.

Mr. TELLER. But has it not been with their permission?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Presumably; but so far as the legislation I have looked up on this question is concerned I find it to be of the loosest character; and it is because such legislation is loose, and because the legislation of every State must be loose with reference to commerce outside of its borders, that the United States should assume its rightful domain and its rightful jurisdiction.

Why do I ask that the United States should assume this jurisdiction? Simply because the roads were organized, in the first place, as State roads. No one contemplated that any of these roads would finally run through so many States. It was never contemplated in the beginning of their construction that there would be a continuous line—a great system embracing roads which would be in operation over one-third or one-half of the States of the Union.

This consolidation has been effected with a machinery that was entirely inadequate. I can not but admire the genius of the men who have framed these great combinations, while I may condemn the rapacity of some of them. I can not but admire the great constructive genius which has organized machines that meet our economic requirements and serve the entire country; but I believe that they have done it against the laws condemning restraint of competition in many cases, and that so far as the sanction of the States has been given to these systems it has been secured largely by pressure, and the legislation has been loose in the extreme. I wish to substitute for this State and divided control, for the varying legislation of forty-five different States involving forty-five different systems of law, a single law of incorporation and consolidation enacted by the legislative body of a sovereignty embracing the entire people and having jurisdiction over every foot of our country, regardless of State lines, in a matter properly intrusted to it under the Constitution.

But I wished also to refer to the Atlantic Coast Line system, which has over 10,000 miles of railroad, or more than one-third of the entire mileage of ten Southern States. That company was also organized under the laws of Virginia, with a liberal provision in its charter for the reorganization of a particular road in Virginia, with no limit on bond issues and a high limit on its stock issues and almost unlimited power of purchase, consolidation, and lease. There have been various organizations and reorganizations of that road, until the system now has 10,000 miles in ten different States. What have they done? Not content with consolidation under the laws of Virginia, they have resorted to the State of Connecticut, and the control of that entire system of railways is now vested in a holding company organized under the laws of Connecticut, which has not within its limits a mile of the track of the system that it controls. I ask Senators from the Southern States whether they would prefer to have the legislation under which these systems can be consolidated the legislation of a particular State in which they can not by any possibility share or whether they would prefer to have the legislation of the United States, in which they all share?

The Atlantic Coast Line system, in the first place, after numerous consolidations, involved only about 6,000 miles of railroad. It has now nearly 10,000. How was it enlarged? It was enlarged by consolidation with or rather the absorption of the great Louisville and Nashville system, embracing about 4,000 miles. How was that accomplished? We all know the history of it. It is said that Mr. Gates, of the steel trust, made a raid upon the Louisville and Nashville stock and obtained the control of it, and Mr. Morgan, who was the controlling mind of the Southern Railway system, and who has influence in the Atlantic Coast Line system, became alarmed. He says in his testimony that he did not regard Mr. Gates as a proper person to have control of the transportation of the Louisville and Nashville. Their real fear was that the Louisville and Nashville would be conducted as a competing road, as a wrecking road, and that it would be conducted in such a way as to compel the Atlantic Coast Line and the Southern Railway Line, two competing lines, to come to terms and to give them a large profit; and so they concluded, and they wisely concluded, to come to quick terms with Mr. Gates.

It was found that Mr. Gates was willing to part with his stock at a considerable advance over what he had paid for it—and let me say here that the operations in acquiring a control of the stock had led, of course, to a great advance—so that finally those gentlemen purchased from Mr. Gates the control of the stock of the Louisville and Nashville road at a price very much above what its market value was before Mr. Gates commenced his operations.

How was that purchase accomplished? Did Mr. Morgan buy it? Did the Southern Railway Company buy it? Oh, no! Mr. Morgan was, doubtless, advised that the Southern Railway could not buy it, because the Louisville and Nashville was a competing system, and the principle of the Northern Securities decision would apply to it, for the Southern Railway Company has two entrances from the North to the South—one toward New York, east of the Appalachian Mountains, and one toward Chicago and Cincinnati and Louisville, to the west of the Appalachian Mountains—and the field of the operations of the Louisville and Nashville road was in the region west of the Appalachian Mountains and in the same States.

So, fearing that this combination with the Southern Railway Company might be void under the Sherman Act as in restraint of competition, Mr. Morgan doubtless communicated with his friend, who was in control of the Atlantic Coast Line, and in a short time the transaction, involving millions, was carried out. The Atlantic Coast Line, which up to that time had a system of railroads simply down the coast, acquired the Louisville and Nashville, and then the entire area of the Atlantic Coast Line becomes coterminous with that of the Southern Railway system; but the very intimacy of the negotiations between the Atlantic Coast Line and the Southern Railway system regarding the acquisition of the Louisville and Nashville tends to prove that the Atlantic Coast Line and the Southern Railway Company, while apparently competing lines, were really under one control; and when the Atlantic Coast Line secured the control through the absorption of the Louisville and Nashville system, it really made a still further consolidation of control in that entire area, so that to-day these two great systems, together with the Illinois Central, have a practical monopoly of the transportation of the ten or more Southern States.

I wish to add again that what I say is not hostile to that combination. I believe that it has been a good thing for the South. I believe that it has given to them for the first time in their history an efficient service. I believe that it has reduced operating expenses. I believe that it has extended the trade and commerce of the South, and has been an important factor in its development. All I insist upon is that there has not been a proper control over the capitalization of these systems, and this very operation to which I have referred, adding $50,000,000 to the stock of the Atlantic Coast Line, and the purchase of stock at an exaggerated value, must ultimately fall as a burden upon the southern people in the imposition of higher fare and freights.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Can the Senator inform the Senate whether that consolidation resulted in any change of rates on those three roads—the Louisville and Nashville, the Southern, and the Atlantic Coast Line?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not. I think that probably they acted very moderately so far as any increases are concerned, but we do know——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will allow me to finish my sentences I will yield to him.

But we do know there is great complaint in the South to-day. The towns at the intersecting points of these systems have advantages over points that are not intersected by two railroads. Now, I ask if those two systems are practically consolidated and there is no real competition, why should the stations which have two intersecting lines have an advantage in the cost of transportation over their neighboring towns having no such intersection?

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it does not relate to the line of thought the Senator from Nevada is now pursuing, but I am not willing to allow his statement to stand unchallenged that the increase of $50,000,000 in the capitalization of these roads shall ultimately fall as a burden upon the people whom they serve. If my view can prevail, and the right of the States within their borders to regulate freight charges and the right of the Federal Government within its borders to regulate freight charges shall be established and exercised, then it will make no difference in the regulation of those charges what may be the capitalization, because the charges will be fixed upon the basis of actual value; and the value of the railroad is not determined by the amount of the capital stock or of the bonded indebtedness. Those things are circumstances to be taken into consideration merely as tending to establish the value of the property; but the criterion at last must be the value of the property. In my judgment, if the court ever reaches the time when it must specify what is the actual value of the property, it will be compelled to say it is the cost of duplication. So far as I am concerned, while I am utterly opposed to the practice of overcapitalizing railroads, and think all the States would better follow the example of the State of Texas and make that overcapitalization either in the way of bonds or stocks impossible, still I will not consent because some State has made the mistake of not limiting the capitalization to a proper value that that fact shall impose a burden upon the people who use the railroads.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to ask the Senator from Texas a question which I think is very pertinent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should prefer to go on, but I will yield to the Senator if it is not a digression.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it is not. At the risk of incurring the displeasure of the Senator from Texas——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator can not do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask him whether we are to receive the doctrine set forth by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] or that set forth by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] as the true Democratic doctrine? I must confess I am a little confused. The speeches come very near together, but they are more or less divergent in their views.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can only say for myself that I am presenting my individual views. As to whether my party will embrace them or not, I do not know; I hope it will; and I hope that members of the Republican party will also embrace them. But I do not think they involve any question of party doctrine, nor do I think they involve any invasion of the rights of the States. I think that they involve simply a proper exercise of the rights and powers of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I want to go on and answer his previous statement. I am afraid that we shall be drawn off into a discussion of side issues.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not intend to make any reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], because that answers itself; but I want to ask the Senator from Nevada a question upon the point he stated at that precise moment. He says that this does not involve any invasion of the rights of the States. I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the statement made by the Supreme Court in the Texas Pacific Railroad case, in which they very strongly intimate that Congress can deny a State the power to regulate these intrastate charges, simply because the railroad whose charges they seek to regulate holds a Federal charter. Now, will the Senator from Nevada give the Senate the benefit of his views upon that question, and will he not admit, if the Supreme Court should follow that intimation to a conclusion to the same effect, that it would be a serious invasion of the rights of the States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to say that if the Supreme Court determines that a national corporation is free from the control of a State tribunal as to such rates, or free from the control of an individual State as to taxation, it involves a serious invasion of the rights of a State. On the contrary, I trust that the Supreme Court will uphold that view, though I fear that it will not, and my proposition does not involve going to that extreme.

I say that it does not involve any invasion of the rights of a State, simply because I believe that the States, as representing the sovereignty of particular areas constituting a part of the United States, are interested in seeing to it that the United States exercises the full powers conferred upon the National Government by the Constitution; but I do not see how the United States can exercise properly the full powers given to the United States for the national defense, for the operation of post-roads, for the regulation of interstate commerce, without creating for that purpose artificial machines called "corporations."

I think that the States as part of the great United States are interested in seeing that those operations should not be embarrassed by the exercise of State powers, which may be destructive of the purpose we have in view. It has been held and declared by the Supreme Court that the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that you can not therefore tax the operations of a national instrumentality, and I should be glad if the Supreme Court would go further and declare that inasmuch as a railroad is the instrumentality through which the United States exercises its functions of the regulation of interstate commerce, that instrumentality shall be free from State taxation. But I would insist upon it as a part of the legislation of the nation that the United States itself should lay down a just and fair rule of taxation, proportionate, just, and fair to all the States, permitting them to tax this national instrumentality, so that their revenue would not suffer. I think it would be infinitely better than the present system of subjecting these great corporations, operating through many States, to the taxing power of all the States through which they pass, those taxing powers being exercised in almost every kind of way, some of them under the influence of tax reformers, some of them under the control of cranks, some of them under the inspiration of blackmail, with the result that the railroads are thrown into the bull ring of politics; and then we wonder why they are there.

When you think of the wide range a State now covers in assessing railroads—from the valuation merely of the right of way and the tracks to the combined value of the stocks and bonds in the market—when you reflect that in addition to that a State can take hold not only of the corporation and assess and tax all its property and franchises, but can also assess and tax the stocks and bonds in the hands of individual bondholders and stockholders, thus taxing the whole to the corporation and the parts to the stock and bond holders—a double taxation—you can see the wide range for the blackmailer or of the tax crank. I believe it is in the interest of all the people that taxation of railroads should be put upon a scientific basis, and that the fixed charges of railroads for taxes should not be subject to the varying legislation or to the varying caprices of States in their legislation, but that a just, fair, and proportionate rule for taxation should be prescribed by one great sovereign, the fruits of which should be enjoyed by the States in same just proportion.

It is one of our duties in shaping pending legislation to take the railroads out of politics by making all the factors of their taxes and fixed charges as certain as possible. Thus far, instead of taking them out of politics, we are continually keeping them in by unwise legislation or lack of legislation.

There are $10,000,000,000 invested in these properties. Do you expect the men charged with the responsibility of those $10,000,000,000 to sit idly by when forty-five States are legislating upon the subject of their taxation? Do you expect them to sit idly by when tax reformers and tax cranks are pressing their views upon every community, when the judgments of forty-five different boards of equalization as to the rule that should control are at variance; when the assessors throughout the country differ as to the rule that should control? When this is the state of facts, do you expect them to fold their arms and say, "We will do nothing," or do you expect them to get into politics? And what does getting into politics mean with a corporation? One way of getting into politics is to bribe every official that they have anything to do with, or attempt to do it. Another is to endeavor to control the political organizations of both parties in a particular State; and they have found that the more decent and the more honest way is to attempt to control the political organizations of both parties.

We know that in all the various States to-day when conventions are held it is a matter of calm and anxious inquiry by the practical politician as to whom the railroads want on the board of equalization, whom the railroads want for assessors, as to whom the railroads want on the board of railroad commissioners; and if the railroads' wants are not consulted the practical politician understands that all the power and all the influence and all the money of that corporation are to be used against his political organization; and the same condition of things exists in the opposing party.

So if the railroads get identified with the machines in every State in the Union, if they control or try to control the nomination and election of officials whose duties touch them either as to taxation or regulation, if they seek to control the legislation of the State as to the laws that shall be passed, and if you ask me what is the cause of the low standard of politics, both as to municipal and State legislation, I will point you to the enforced interference of the railroads in politics through our failure to adopt a wise and rational system of national incorporation of interstate railroads which will fix proper rules for capitalization, for taxation, for return on capital, and other matters now left indeterminate.

I believe that the National Government, representing all the people and voicing the will of all the States, should enter upon the comprehensive work of giving a proper, a complete, and a fair system of taxation, one that will not oppress the roads, one that will make them respond fairly to their obligations to the public, and one that will make the taxes mathematically certain, such as a tax upon gross receipts. That tax would not be measured by the capacity or incapacity of a given official, his discretion or lack of discretion, his honesty or lack of honesty.

So far as concerns the matter of the regulation of State rates, I admit that a more difficult question is presented. But whatever may be the State rates which are fixed by a State regulating body, they finally come, if challenged as confiscatory, under the jurisdiction of the national courts. The interstate rates and the State rates, so far as justice and fairness are concerned, are ultimately determined by a national tribunal. So the State would be powerless, judged by this rule, to embarrass the operation of a national corporation. Besides, the State business is so small, in the State of Nebraska aggregating only one-twentieth, throughout the entire Union embracing only one-fourth, that we might well concede the right of the States to regulate the State rates without imperiling the system to which I have called your attention.

The Senator from Texas alluded to the system which prevails in Texas, and here let me say that there are two States in the Union which have enlightened legislation regarding railroads, and those two States are the antipodes of our country. They are Massachusetts and Texas. Both of those States absolutely guard and control capitalization as an essential factor in determining what the public utilities shall charge for their services. The Senator from Texas is quite right when he insists it is not a controlling factor; that the real factor is the value, but the Senator will admit that capitalization is oftentimes an embarrassing factor.

As to overcapitalization, when a corporation is created the men who create it do not long hold the securities which they have created. They put them off on the public through the stock exchanges, which they manipulate and control. The securities fall into the hands of the honest investors of the country—into the hands of women and children, of the widows in whose behalf we hear so many appeals made. Those appeals have a certain weight. The claim is made that, inasmuch as society has stood by and permitted this overcapitalization to be created, it should not so exercise its arbitrary power as to deprive those who are the innocent victims of the act of overcapitalization of the value of their property, which has been fixed in the markets.

What does Texas do? Here let me say that what I wish to do is to nationalize the system of Texas, the best system in the country, in my judgment better even than that of Massachusetts. What did they do under the inspiration of Judge Reagan and during the gubernatorial administration, I believe, of the senior Senator from Texas? They provided that no stocks or bonds could be issued without the approval of the State railroad commission, and that such approval must be stamped upon the securities themselves. And besides this the law limits the return of railroad corporations to 6 per cent upon their capital. The result is that Texas is one of the best controlled States in the Union as to these public utilities. It is true that Mr. Marowetz, the eminent authority on corporation law, when he appeared before our committee and was questioned by me with reference to the system prevailing in Texas, insisted upon it that it had discouraged railroad building; that the railway investors of the country actually avoided Texas, because Texas gave no opportunity for speculative reward, and that the securities of Texas roads were but little sold upon the New York exchange.

The senior Senator from Texas had a reply to that statement published as a public document. (I have it not before me, for I have just dropped into this debate and am not armed at all with notes or references.) It is a letter from one of the railroad commissioners of Texas, in which he challenges that statement, and shows by the record that the securities of Texas roads are so sold, but he accounts for the fact that a large number of their securities are not upon the market because they have been purchased by these great holding companies which have been organized under the laws of other States, and they are held in block in the treasury of these great systems. But as to the discouragement of railroad building, he points to the fact that Texas is the third State in the Union in the matter of mileage. The only two States that surpass it are Pennsylvania and Illinois.

But, Mr. President, I have been drawn away from my discussion of the situation in the Southern States. It is claimed that the Southern Railway Company and the Atlantic Coast Line system are practically under one control, which embraces a monopoly of that entire area, and yet an apparent competition is maintained, which means that certain intersecting points have the advantage over their neighbors. I ask whether it is the policy of the United States to perpetuate that condition? We say that the individual shall not have an advantage over his neighbor in rates. We call that discrimination. But we say that any town that has two railroads instead of one can have rates 20 per cent below those of the town that has but one.

What does it mean? A constant augmentation of population in the large centers—overpopulation—tending to the deterioration of the race. What reason is there why in the city of New York, for instance, upon a few square miles of land, one-twentieth of the entire population of the country should be centered? Why in the city of Chicago should one-thirtieth or one-fortieth of the entire population of the country be centered upon a few square miles of land? Is it a good thing for the race? Is it a good thing for the entire people, for whose welfare under the Constitution we must legislate? Yet this system, which is drifting the population to congested centers, is maintained, not as the result not only of active competition, but of supposed competition.

Would it not be better for the people of the South if those two railroads were consolidated into one corporation under a national law providing the proper restraints and regulation? Would there not be a fairer service, a more equal service, a more proportionate service, and a fairer distribution of the burden of the cost of transportation?

I admit it would be a bad thing to consolidate the two roads into one company if there were no control by the National Government of the amount of capitalization of the corporation under which they were consolidated, if there were no restraint upon the consolidation itself to reasonable limits, if no rules were laid down regarding return upon capital, etc. But I insist that it would be a beneficial thing for the people of the South, tending toward fairness and impartiality of administration, if under national legislation—and the national sovereign is the only one that can deal with it—those two systems were put under one control, and that if the consent of these States is necessary it should be as freely conceded as to consolidation under Connecticut or New Jersey law.

Mr. President, we have no conception of the extent to which this consolidation has gone. We have in the North here what we call three or four great trunk lines—the New York Central system, the Pennsylvania system, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Chesapeake and Ohio, four so-called "competitive trunk lines."

And yet it is capable of demonstration that the Pennsylvania Railroad to-day has control of the Baltimore and Ohio, and it is capable of demonstration that the two, together with the New York Central, practically control the trunk line area embracing all the States between Chicago and New York and Pennsylvania and Maryland. It is true they are under the control of two or three so-called "groups," but as a matter of fact it is claimed by men familiar with these things that they constitute but one organization. You ask is combination to be favored? It is already here, but it is uncontrolled combination. It is combination under the laws of a particular State, which, by reason of the limit of its area and jurisdiction, is incapable of dealing with the entire subject.

The Senator from Colorado referred to the fact that a corporation organized under the laws of one State could not do business within the boundaries of another State without the consent of that State. That is true. But we know that these railroads control in large degree the consent of the States. There, again, we throw them into politics, and we wonder why they are there. It is because they know there is but one way of administering a railroad system, and that is to obey this natural law toward combination. They find obstacles in the way—the laws or lack of laws in the various States—and so they are obliged to be factors in politics, and here again comes an element of control in State legislation. It accounts for the fact which exists to-day, that the legislation of almost all of the States is loose beyond description. We know to-day that the State of New Jersey makes a practice of organizing corporations which are to do business in other States, and we know that a State which enacts a wise code of laws properly restricting these corporations is shunned and avoided, and thus falls a victim to its own virtue. The States are unable to deal with the question. It is by the proper exercise of the power conferred upon us by the Constitution that we can practically deal with the question of overcapitalization.

How would you meet it? I should permit national incorporation for the construction or purchase or consolidation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce and give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to determine and approve the issue of stock and bonds by every corporation organized under the national act that proposes to issue them for construction or purchase or combination. I presume at the start they might have to validate a good deal of water now in the stock. In justice to the vast body of investors all over the country, who have been persuaded to buy overcapitalized securities, they might do that. But if we should validate all the present overcapitalization and at the same time prevent overcapitalization in the future, we shall have done a service to posterity the value of which can not be measured.

We have had in the past only a tithe of the overcapitalization which under loose laws will be accomplished in the future. If we require the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we have a body of capable men, with full knowledge regarding these matters, with accumulated experience, acting impartially between the public and the railroads, and determining and approving stock and bond issues; and while, as I say, it may result in the validation of much of the stock watered in the past, it will absolutely prevent it in the future.

Then I would in such a law provide a rule for the taxation of such property, a percentage tax. I would permit the States to levy it, thus having nothing whatever to do with its collection. I would prescribe a rule, and a mathematical rule, so that nothing would be left to discretion and so that when the Interstate Commerce Commission came to consider the question of rates, as affecting the net income, it would know exactly what amount must be allowed for taxes as an annual charge. Then we would not have the judgment of the various States confusing the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining what are just rates, what ought to be allowed as fixed charges, and what ought to be allowed as taxes.

What I complain of is that although the Supreme Court has laid down the rule for the regulation of rates, as involving a fair return upon the value of the property affected, in the consideration of which certain factors are to be considered, such as the stock and bond issues, the actual cost, the actual cost of reproduction, etc., we in our legislation do not provide the factors by which the Interstate Commerce Commission can be guided. We should furnish them with the means of determining the capitalization of these corporations, and if we do not enter upon a national incorporation of railways, we should at all events provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission should enter upon a valuation of the railroads, and to that valuation must be added from time to time the increases of bond and stock issues made by the corporation with the approval of the Commission.

But there is another thing we can determine. We can determine the return upon capital. Some of my friends regard that as an innovation. It has existed throughout the history of this country. When we organized the Union Pacific Railroad, we provided that the rates should be diminished after the income reached 10 per cent; and in the case of the Texas Pacific road I believe there was a similar limitation. I was reading the charter of a railroad company in Arkansas the other day where the limitation was 15 per cent. That was when high rates of interest prevailed. In Massachusetts to-day the limitation upon the return on capital in electric railroads, which are being built all over the State, is 6 per cent, with an allowance of one-half of the additional profits to the corporation and the other half to be paid to the State.

The result is that nothing has ever been paid to the State. The corporation itself has never received the other half of the profits in the shape of dividends, but all excesses over 6 per cent have gone to the betterment and extension of roads and toward reasonable reductions of rates. The advantage of a limitation upon the dividend return on capital is that it works automatically either toward the betterment of the road, the reduction in rate, or to an increase of wages, all of which are to the interest of the country. Otherwise an increase of business tends simply to the increase of profit to the stockholder.

This system, while securing to him a fair return upon his investment, gives the balance of the profit, caused by an increase of population and an increase of business, to the public in the shape of the betterment of the road, in the shape of increased wages to employees, in the shape of reduced rates; and I insist that if we should enter upon a system of a proper capitalization of these roads, approved by the United States Government, and a fair and fixed return upon the capital invested, the Interstate Commerce Commission will hardly ever have cause to act, and automatically the entire administration of these roads will tend toward impartiality in place of partiality, to reasonable rates instead of unreasonable rates, to the betterment of roads instead of exhausting the roads with a view to paying dividends.

Thus we would have an automatic kind of adjustment under national control which would do away, not only with extortionate rates, not only with the oppression of the public, but would do away absolutely with the interference of the railroad corporations in politics, for they are there only to protect their $10,000,000,000; they are there only to protect their income, and if we protect their capitalization, if we prescribe the income upon that capitalization, so that it is simply a matter of mathematical calculation, then necessarily they would be sufficiently protected and could gain nothing by a resort to political control. They can not get more and they can not get less, and they will be eliminated from politics, because there will be no reason for their being in politics.

Now, Mr. President, we have a country of high ideals and of low standards. Our standards would be as high as our ideals if our legislation was as wise as our ideals are high. We have low standards because our legislation regarding these corporations has not been wise. As I stated in the outset, we have allowed them to remain in politics, all their affairs subject to the varying judgments and caprices and passions of officials and of the public at large, and we are responsible for their being there. I ask the Senate of the United States to do something toward conforming the standards of the country to its ideals, and the most important thing is to purify political administration everywhere by eliminating the railroads from politics by a wise and comprehensive system of national incorporation which, whilst protecting the people and communities against discrimination and extortion, will also protect the railroads against popular caprice and passion.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may lie on the table, so that it may be called up hereafter if any Senator desires to speak upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 20th instant approved and signed an act (S. 2558) authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.

BATTLE MONUMENTS IN CUBA.

Mr. WARREN. I submit a resolution which I send to the desk. It is rather important that it should be disposed of. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is authorized to employ the United States Army transport Sumner to convey, from New York to Santiago de Cuba and return, the members of the Santiago Battlefield Commission and the representatives of the President and of the State and War Departments, to enable them to attend the ceremonies to be held at the dedication of battle monuments at El Caney, Fort San Juan, San Juan Ridge, and San Juan de Mayaras Hill, in the immediate vicinity of Santiago de Cuba.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming from what appropriation this comes?

Mr. WARREN. It requires no appropriation. The regular Army transportation appropriation provides for it.

The appropriation made for the purpose of erecting these battlefield monuments was contained in the sundry civil appropriation act of last year. Under a memorandum of the War Department no portion of the money was to be used for traveling expenses or for compensation. The members of the committee having the matter in charge have paid their own way, but now there is a quantity of material to be transported, as well as the committee, and there is also a desire to send a member of each one of the boards, such as fortifications, etc. So that now we have three purposes: First, to transport the material; second, the committee, and, third, a number of officers to perform various duties.

While I think possibly the transport could be used without such a resolution, the Secretary of War has asked the passage of this resolution, so that there can be no doubt about the matter. It appropriates no money and costs nothing except the additional use of the transport.

Mr. KEAN. It costs some money, does it not?

Mr. WARREN. The transport is in commission and lying at New York. If the Department is authorized to use it at once it merely costs the difference between the cost of travel and lying at the station at New York, which is very slight.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the transport is going there in any event?

Mr. WARREN. Not necessarily just now, but it will carry material and the committee, as well as members of other committees.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Wyoming give some idea of the number of persons who will be transported?

Mr. WARREN. Probably a dozen or two dozen persons.

I ask that the papers which I send to the desk—a letter from the Secretary of War and other papers bearing upon the subject—be printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not object to the consideration of the resolution. I understand from the statement so well made by the Senator from Wyoming that this is an arrangement which will require very little expenditure. Last year, at the urgent solicitation of a good many very good people in the Senate, then and elsewhere, an appropriation of $9,500 was made for the purpose of erecting suitable monuments commemorating the battles in Cuba. The Secretary of War was, of course, to expend the money. He has expended, I understand, or proposes to expend, the entire sum in preparing the monuments and placing them properly on these battlefields.

Of course the appropriation of $9,500 would not have been sufficient also to bear the expenses of those who have had charge of this work. I understand from these documents that a small committee of three or four persons went down there in a preliminary way and paid their own expenses. Under an order from the War Department no part of their expenses was allowed to be paid either from this special appropriation or from any other appropriation made for the Army by Congress.

I understand also that we have this transport, the Sumner, lying at the proper place in New York, and that it is the design to place the material for the monuments upon this Government vessel and carry the material down there. I suppose if the transport is suitable for the carriage of the few people who are to go there they may as well be carried on the transport as in any other way, and that it can be done without any very great expense.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The commission goes down at the same time, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. The commission goes down with the material and puts it in place.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand the dedication could not occur without the commission going down there. I think it is very plain, if that is true, that the resolution is eminently proper.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely. I think the commission is a small one, consisting of only three or four persons.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The dedication of these very important monuments could not occur unless they were there? Is not that true?

Mr. ALLISON. I should think their presence would be very necessary to the dedication of the monuments. It is a small matter.

Mr. FORAKER. It is true, is it not, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Iowa, that this commission is not paid any salary or does not occasion the Government any expense whatever for the services?

Mr. ALLISON. None whatever. There is no salary paid.

Mr. FORAKER. They are very experienced men, and they are doing this as a labor of love and through patriotism.

Mr. WARREN. They have paid their own expenses so far.

Mr. BACON. Nothing said by myself was intended as indicating opposition to the resolution, but I thought it proper that we should have the information which has now been given to us. I am very glad indeed to have it. I would not myself put any obstacle in the way of a proper observance of the ceremonies, which I think are eminently due to the commemoration of such an important event in history as is marked by those battles.

Mr. TELLER. I understand this is simply executing the law on this subject that we passed. That is all there is of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

On June 2, 1905, I appointed a committee on Department methods to investigate the business methods and practice of the Executive Departments, and to report plans for their improvement. This committee has taken up its great task vigorously, and material benefit to the Government service has already resulted from its efforts.

Much valuable information has been gathered, and the preliminary work is largely done. The time has now come for the committee to assign trained men to the detailed investigation of routine throughout the Government service as a basis for definite steps towards added economy and efficiency. Many men already in the Government service can be assigned temporarily to this work, and some of them can be properly paid under the appropriations against which their salaries are charged. Others must be obtained from outside. The committee on Department methods will need the assistance not only of efficient men in the Government service, but also of recognized business experts from private life. To that end, I ask that the Congress provide an appropriation of $25,000, to be expended under the direction of the President, for the payment of salaries and expenses of specialists and experts to investigate and report upon business methods and practice throughout the Government service. Since the work of the committee on Department methods has already reached a stage where the employment of such experts is necessary, this appropriation should be available immediately and until expended.

SETTLEMENT OF DANISH CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

In connection with the matter of this Government's obligation to pay to that of Germany the sum of $20,000 in settlement of certain Samoan claims under the convention of November 7, 1899, between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain, and the decision of the King of Sweden and Norway as arbitrator under the convention, which I forwarded to the Congress on December 15, 1905, I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State showing the obligation to pay, under Article III of that convention, the sum of $760 in settlement of Danish claims.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, showing the acceptance by the International Prison Congress of the invitation to hold its next meeting in the United States, extended in pursuance of the joint resolution, approved March 3, 1905.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

ORDINANCES OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

Referring to section 32 of the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith three ordinances (enumerated in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State), enacted by the executive council of Porto Rico with the approval of the government thereof.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BOISE, IDAHO.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KEAN. Certainly; if the matter the Senator wishes to call up will lead to no debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1365) providing for the placing of an elevator in the public building at Boise, Idaho. I will say in explanation that the plans contemplated an elevator, but because of lack of funds the elevator was not provided, and the five-story building now stands without any elevator. It is completed otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $6,500 for placing an elevator in the public building at Boise, Idaho.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 23, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 22, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. ANDREWS BAY.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11263) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11263) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, under the rule this fourth Monday of the month is set aside for District business. The House has had under consideration the urgent deficiency bill for two days, and it is very desirable that we continue the consideration of that bill until it is ended. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House continue its consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I would ask that next Monday be fixed for District day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that next Monday be set apart as District day. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payments to New York and Pennsylvania: To pay to the State of New York the sum of $118,585.84, and to the State of Pennsylvania $236,762.65, said sums being certified to Congress at its present session, in House Document No. 167, as having been ascertained to be due said States, respectively, under the provision in the general claims act approved February 24, 1905; in all, $355,348.49.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] what this item is for?

Mr. LITTAUER. These items are to repay advances made by these States during the war of 1812. The claims are reported under the provisions of the claims act of February 24, 1905.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How much of the item is principal and how much interest?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from New York, I can give the gentleman from Mississippi the information he desires. The State of Pennsylvania originally expended for the benefit of the United States $292,120.83 at various periods. Subsequent thereto, during the years 1816 and 1817, the United States returned to the State of Pennsylvania the sum of $280,000, leaving a balance due, principal and interest, on July 5, 1827, of $45,830.26, which sum, with interest thereon for seventy-eight years and four months and nineteen days, amounting to $190,932.39, now aggregates $236,762.65.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then the interest that we pay now is compounded on the interest that was due up to that first date the gentleman mentioned?

Mr. BURLESON. It is calculated in accordance with the provisions of the law—under the same law that a settlement was effected with the States of Maryland and Virginia. This computation has been carefully made, and the sum I have last named is due under the law. Now, with reference to the claim of the State of New York, that State expended originally for the General Government the sum of $137,013.01, the expenditures being made at various periods. Certain interest had accrued on this sum, and subsequently at various dates there was returned to the State of New York $139,124.62, leaving the balance due on October 26, 1826, the sum of $20,729.01. The interest on that sum for seventy-eight years and two hundred and forty-eight days amounts to $97,856.83, making an aggregate sum now due of $118,585.84. These calculations have been made in accordance with a specific law which covers these claims, and I can state to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] that the items are properly in this bill; that under the law the amounts are due the States of New York and Pennsylvania and should be paid.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Very well; I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chicago, Ill., post-office and court-house: For improvements and changes of a general nature, exclusive of furniture, in order to better fit the building for the transaction of the public business, $138,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to make some inquiries of the committee for my own information. I see here is a provision by which in the deficiency bill an allowance is made of $138,000 for improvements and changes of a general nature in a post-office at Chicago. Now, I have been for no less than three years trying to get an additional amount to complete the construction of a wing to a post-office in Rochester, and I did not suppose it was possible through a deficiency appropriation bill to get an allowance of that sort. If it is, I should be very glad, indeed, to avail myself of the services of that committee for that end.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would state that this sum is simply a continuance of the practice that was held in this same bill last year, when $250,000 was appropriated for improvements and changes in the post-office at Chicago. This great building has turned out to be particularly unfitted for its work. There are features in connection with it that demand immediate change in order that life may be secure. The building has under it a large tunnel, emerging on two of the main streets of Chicago, where the coming and going of wagons has resulted in many accidents and, I believe, in loss of life. It was considered that these improvements and changes of a general nature were proper to be inserted in this bill, with the example of the action of the House last year before us. The items are specific items in the submissions made to us.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not complain at all of what has been done for Chicago, but the public building at Rochester is also unfit for life and limb. The completion of the wing is just as much required to do the work with decency and even in a manner required by the life of the employees as anything else, and I do not see why, if an allowance of this sort is made, which I do not at all criticise, Chicago should be the only city in which an addition to a building should be completed when it is required by the health of the employees and the necessities of the service.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Why, of course.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman from New York ever secured from the Treasury Department a recommendation to Congress in favor of the appropriation which he now asks?

Mr. PERKINS. Why, this is for the erection of a wing.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is for the erection of a new part of the building.

Mr. PERKINS. And we have not money enough to finish it.

Mr. TAWNEY. That recommendation has gone to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. That required authority for the erection of the wing. The Committee on Appropriations not having any legislative jurisdiction, the reference must have necessarily gone to that committee. In this case we have the building, but not suitably adapted to the purposes required.

Mr. PERKINS. Neither is our building fit for use.

Mr. TAWNEY. And it is to complete that which has been already authorized and to make it available for the purpose for which it was intended.

Mr. PERKINS. Our building has been authorized and built.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can aid the gentleman slightly.

Mr. PERKINS. I am not complaining of what is done, but I did not see why it should not have been done for us as well as for Chicago.

Mr. MANN. This is no ordinary case of making changes in a post-office or post-office building. The Post-Office Department has generally moved into the new building. When the building was designed the receipts of the Chicago post-office amounted to a little over $5,000,000 a year; they now amount to over $13,000,000 a year. The office as it was completed when taken possession of was completed upon the basis of a smaller amount of business that was being transacted and there is not a possibility of doing the business properly. For instance, one of the items proposed by this appropriation is to erect a gallery halfway around the building to give that much additional room where the business can be transacted. Business is being delayed. It is not merely business for Chicago, but business which passes through Chicago, business coming in and going out of the Chicago post-office. It is not a practical thing to perform all the work in the office as it is to-day. A part of the work in the Chicago post-office is now being carried on in the old building, although the city has required that that building be taken down and removed, and it is not possible to transfer all the post-office work in the new building without making these changes. This is not making a change in the building at all, I will say to the gentleman from New York, which makes a distinction and quite a distinction in the case.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I make an inquiry?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I recognize that your explanation is entirely adequate so far as the necessity for the appropriation is concerned. I am not thoroughly advised as to what makes an appropriation come on a deficiency bill, but what I would like to inquire about is whether this really properly comes under a deficiency bill or under an ordinary appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. It has as much place on a deficiency bill as on any bill. Of course, ordinarily if it were not for the necessity of its being done at once, which is so apparent, it would go on the sundry civil appropriation bill, but the money should be expended during this fiscal year at once and in order to do that it should go on the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not a deficiency in the sense it is to make up an appropriation already given and proven to be inadequate——

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But in the sense it is to be expended in such a way which requires that it should be done at once?

Mr. MANN. It is deficiency only in the sense it should be spent during the current fiscal year. That is the only sense in which it is a deficiency.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection I have to find in this appropriation, but there is not a word that the gentleman from Illinois has stated that would not apply to a less extent to the building at Rochester. I only wish, without complaining at all of the conduct of the committee, to suggest if this thing can be done in one case I do not see why it could not be done and the endeavor made that it should be done in another. I now, Mr. Chairman, withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except as otherwise provided, one-half of the foregoing amounts to meet deficiencies in the appropriations on account of the District of Columbia shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire how that deficiency of $30,000 arises; in other words, how that happens to be a deficiency? How was it that they could not estimate for the proper amount?

Mr. LITTAUER. Merely through the carelessness of the Commissioners in not submitting a proper estimate last year. We find it to be a fact that it is necessary to have more money to heat these public schools. The Commissioners advised us plainly that they had gotten into the habit of asking for $45,000 and then to depend upon deficiency. Their contracts for the necessary amount to heat the schools are made, and they demand $30,000 to meet them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In other words, it takes about $75,000 a year. There ought to have been an estimate of $75,000. Then it is the fault of the Commissioners in making their original estimate?

Mr. LITTAUER. Plainly so, and it is admitted by them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] one general question for information. Is there not anybody around these Departments that has sense enough and arithmetical skill enough to cipher out the amount of money that will reasonably be expended in a year?

Mr. LITTAUER. There ought to be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the reason that this committee does not compel them to do that?

Mr. LITTAUER. We seek to compel them to do it, and we have gone through two or three passages here where we have dropped out estimates made for deficiencies simply because this same practice had been carried on, and they did not give us a good reason for the appropriation. We must either allow this amount or close up the schools if the weather becomes rigorous.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that, and that is the very thing I am objecting to. I want to make this one general remark. I do not believe there is a man in this House to-day that is not willing to vote every dollar of money that is necessary to run every department of the Government not only in an economical manner, but in an effective manner. But everybody is getting tired of estimates being brought in here that are adequate to cover the expenses and then have to come in with a deficiency bill. Now, for instance, about this school business here, if the gentleman will permit me. It seems to me if it could not be gotten at in any other way, if the committee would come in here and would report the amount of money necessary for coal for the coldest winter that has ever been known to exist here and then appropriate that amount of money it would hold them to the highest accountability for the way they spent the money, and instead of coming in here with a deficiency bill the chances are there would be money covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BURLESON. In justice to the Commissioners, I want to state that since the last appropriation there have been, I think, eight new schools erected—one a high school, and seven other schools—and the erection of these new schools necessitated an increased appropriation.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is in part true. They knew these schools were in the course of erection, and provision for them could have been estimated.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say, for the information of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Before the gentleman makes that statement, I want to say one thing to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON]. My remark about these estimates was not applied to the Commissioners alone, but to every department of the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say that the excuse offered for this deficiency is not an adequate one, for the reason that their estimates for the years 1903, 1904 and 1905, 1906 and 1907 have been uniformly $45,000, and before the expiration of the fiscal year in every instance it was necessary for them to secure a deficiency appropriation of $30,000 in order to supply the necessary fuel to keep the schools of this city running. Now, if it had not been for the fact that without this additional appropriation the schools of the District of Columbia would have to be closed, I am inclined to think the Committee on Appropriations would not have allowed this amount, because it is not a legal deficiency. The apportionment had never been made.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman said the apportionment had never been made. That is just what I was going to ask him.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not a legal deficiency; but the exigency of the occasion necessitates this additional appropriation, and the evidence showed that they had uniformly since 1903 expended $75,000 for this very purpose every fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this school deficiency, but I want to find out now from the Committee on Appropriations if they are going to compel these other estimaters to make proper estimates, no matter what Department it is.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that, in my judgment, when the estimate comes for the next fiscal year for this purpose, it will be for the full amount required for this purpose, and that statement is based upon the criticism indulged in at the time the matter was before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are you going to make all these other men that make the estimates for the other Departments come up in the same way?

Mr. TAWNEY. We are attempting to do that by the amendment to the present law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question before he takes his seat. Now, I understand you have attempted in this bill to remedy the defects in the present law, and you used here an expression, when the occasion is an "extraordinary emergency" or "unusual circumstance." Now, if you are dealing with the character of men indicated upon this floor, as men who are disposed to evade the law, as has been stated frequently, why do you not stop at "extraordinary emergency" and not use the vague and indefinite language of an "unusual circumstance?" I want you to give the reason for that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say here to the gentleman from Alabama that this discussion in respect to the details of that proposed amendment ought to come when that amendment is reached. We want to proceed as fast as possible with the reading of the bill, and when that amendment is reached in future we will take it up for full discussion, and the question of the gentleman can then be more fully answered.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I merely desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, and the distinguished gentleman from New York who has charge of this bill to the fact that in my opinion if you are dealing with the character of men so characterized on this floor as Cabinet officers I feel that there will be the same opportunity given under the broad phrase of the language used here—"unusual circumstances"—to evade all these things that you say they have been evading under the language of the law. That is the suggestion that I propose to make.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee now in going into a full explanation of that; but the matter will be fully explained when this subject is reached.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Another inquiry I desire to make of the gentleman from Minnesota. I understand him to say that the Commissioners did not make an apportionment under the provisions of the law.

Mr. TAWNEY. They did not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will be glad if the gentleman will state why they did not make any apportionment; and will the gentleman state what reason, if any, they gave for not complying with the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. As I now recollect it, not having the testimony of the Commissioners before me, it was owing to the peculiar conditions in the city here in respect to the purchase of coal. An effort was made on the part of the Commissioners to purchase coal elsewhere than from the dealers here, and, after some investigation and some trouble, that was not accomplished. The reasons are fully set forth by the Commissioners in their statement before the committee, but I have not that before me at this time.

Mr. LITTAUER. The coal is contracted for. The Commissioners make contracts with the lowest bidder for a given amount of coal. They can hardly apportion it regularly in a monthly way, for you could not tell what amount of coal is necessary in two different quarters in the year. But the entire procedure here is wrong, and is admitted by the Commissioners to be so. They tell us it has been the custom to have this $45,000, and then to come in for a deficiency, and they said that $30,000 is the same deficiency that was asked for last year and the year before. I asked:

Do you think that is a good practice?

The Commissioner said he did not.

I asked:

Do you not render yourself liable to that provision in the deficiency law passed last year? This is a dangerous thing.

The answer is:

I can look at the estimate and find out.

And then they go on in the ordinary, general fashion, until finally I told him:

I trust you will correct it.

Meaning this manner of doing business. The Commissioner said:

I will see that it is done.

It is just that habit that we want to put an end to; it places the appropriation in a false light when it is originally offered.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state in answer to the gentleman's question that in the judgment of the Commission this law did not apply to the District of Columbia. That was the excuse given for not apportioning the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I want to make an observation for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri. I notice that there is a tendency to criticise the deficiency appropriations. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] says that they ought to make estimates larger than they do. Now, I wish to have him for a moment reflect upon this proposition. It is almost invariably the case——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to make one remark. I did not say I wanted them to make their estimates larger. I said I wanted them to make them large enough to cover the expense.

Mr. MANN. If you make the estimates large enough to cover the possible expense, that means to make them larger than the probable expense. If the officer only makes his estimate large enough for the probable expense, then there is sure to be a deficiency estimate come in later, more or less of the time. Now, I think it would be the observation of the gentleman from Missouri and of the members of the Committee on Appropriations that where an appropriation is made the Department or the Bureau to which that appropriation goes considers that it is entitled to expend it, and if it does not expend it for the purpose for which it is appropriated, it will come in and ask that it may expend it either for some other purpose or for some other year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me ask you a question. We can arrive at the truth quicker by questioning each other than by making speeches. As I understand it in a general way, the cost, by original appropriation and in deficiency, for coal for the schools of the District of Columbia is about $75,000 a year. They say that is what it is. Now, suppose we appropriate $80,000, is there not some way to keep them from expending more money for coal than they ought to expend?

Mr. MANN. Well, now, the gentleman cites the case of the District of Columbia, and calls attention to this particular item. That is true; but the gentleman must remember that in making up the District of Columbia appropriation bill the revenues are limited; the amounts that can be appropriated for all purposes are limited, depending upon the amounts of estimated revenue from the District, which pays one-half the expense. I suppose whatever the expense is, the District will have to pay one-half of it. The gentleman refers to an item for coal here, but I call the gentleman's attention to an item on the next page of this bill reappropriating an unexpended balance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What appropriation is that?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can see as well as I can.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have got it there.

Mr. MANN. Under the head of "Interstate Commerce Commission," an unexpended balance—to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep informed regarding compliance with the "Act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," approved March 2, 1893, including the employment of inspectors to execute and enforce the requirements of the said act.

That is undoubtedly a proper reappropriation, but that is the fact.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask you right there, why is it a proper reappropriation?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will get hold of one of them directly and find that out.

Mr. MANN. What I want to call attention to is the fact that when an appropriation is made for an amount that is larger than is needed for that particular purpose, it seems to be the opinion of the bureau or department that they have a right to use the money for some purpose, and they come in and ask that it be transferred to some other purpose than the one stated in the appropriation bill, and we give them the authority very often because we think, "Well, that money has already gone out of the Treasury. It is already appropriated, and to reappropriate it will not increase the total appropriation for the year."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there no way of breaking up that habit of mind about the appropriations?

Mr. MANN. There is no way I know of of breaking up the habit of mind about appropriations, except for the House itself to carefully scrutinize the appropriations as they come in, and for us to judge in a particular case whether the appropriation ought to be made or not. I do not care whether it comes as an original appropriation or as a deficiency appropriation, except in those cases where the authority to make a deficiency increases the total expense that ought to be cut down. I hope the committee will not get into the habit of thinking that they have got to make an appropriation at the beginning large enough to cover all possible contingencies in order to prevent a deficiency. That would be far worse than a deficiency every few years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As I remarked to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] when he had the floor two days ago, I would like to know from whom this coal is bought and how, and my inquiry goes back to that proposition. The gentleman from New York will remember that about two years ago we had a coal famine here, and yet coal galore—by the carload—was just outside of the confines of the city, and the coal dealers and venders, it will be remembered, in the city of Washington combined to put up the price of coal so that the people did not have money enough to buy it. It had the effect of putting up the price of coal upon the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia. We used wood here a day or two in the House furnaces as a result of this famine. I want to inquire of the gentleman from New York what effect that coal famine had upon the price of coal and the revenues that we had appropriated to pay for the coal.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, the coal famine took place too long ago to affect the price now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no; I remember distinctly of people freezing in the streets of Washington, and yet coal by the train load was just outside of the city.

Mr. LITTAUER. This coal is contracted for once a year to provide for all the necessities of these schools and to be delivered at the schools.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How is it bought?

Mr. LITTAUER. By contract with the lowest bidder.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And who have been the bidders?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am not in possession of the facts to inform the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know from whom the coal has been bought? We know that the Government has been held up in the purchase of material for the buildings at Annapolis, where we at first appropriated $8,000,000. The Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody, said that steel and other products had been put up so high on him that he would not stick a single spade in the ground until we gave him $2,000,000 more, to overcome that difficulty. Now, what effect has this coal trust—and there was one over in West Virginia that the courts have got hold of—I don't know what they have done with it—but what effect has this combination or any coal combination had upon the price of coal in this District?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that we entered into a line of inquiry in that direction. We asked the Commissioner whether the coal was contracted for, and his answer was "Yes."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On what page of the hearings?

Mr. LITTAUER. I read from page 60:

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Speaking of coal here in the city, are you confined to dealers here from whom you buy coal?

Mr. WEST. No; because we advertise for bids, and under prevailing conditions you would find the large dealers outside and the large companies outside will not come in and bid against the local dealers here. They all have an understanding between them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Ah, yes; that is it.

Mr. LITTAUER (continuing reading):

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why do you not buy at the mines?

Mr. WEST. I doubt very much if we could buy at the mines; if we did we would have to arrange for carrying the coal here and the delivery ourselves and all that sort of thing. We have a plan next year for the next contract for coal which I think will in a measure obviate the conditions we are now contending with.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, gentlemen, you see that I remember these conditions, and I can not help but believe that the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States are being held up in these coal contracts, and as a result of it we are having these deficiencies here. The gentleman has just read from the hearings that the coal dealers have an "understanding between" themselves. Now, my recollection is that we appointed a year or so ago a committee to investigate this coal famine and the causes of it, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] was on that committee, was he not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, what did you do? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that five minutes allowed me would not be time enough to go into it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I will vote to give you a whole day if you will break up this robbery. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. We did not break it up, but we did disclose many valuable facts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Give us the substance of them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have not time to do that, but I will say to the gentleman that we did not investigate specifically the price of coal in the District of Columbia. We covered the general situation more with reference to the question of transportation. We discovered that they were controlling, so far as that was concerned, the transportation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And didn't they control the amount of coal?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; we discovered the fact that nearly every one of these railroads owned most of the coal property and that they were in a position where they could control it, and that they were in a situation where they could control not only the price, but the transportation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman is in favor of railroad-rate regulation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am in favor of any proper regulation that will take care of these conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say it as seriously as any man can, that we have here to-day disclosed, first, the testimony that there is an "understanding between" the inside coal dealers that are holding up the Government and the outside coal dealers and railroads that are furnishing them with the coal that they will not compete, and the Government of the United States is at their mercy, and here we are paying the penalty in the shape of a $30,000 deficit. We pay the penalty, as Secretary Moody's statement a couple of years ago showed, of being held up by the steel and other trusts to the amount of $2,000,000 in a contract of $8,000,000. We appropriated $8,000,000, and he said he would not move a foot until we gave him two millions more, to overcome the damage that had been wrought by these trusts. And here comes the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], the illustrious trust buster [laughter], and he tells us that the railroads that come to the city of Washington are controlling the coal conditions; that they not only own the coal mines, but that they are controlling the transportation of coal to the city of Washington, and now Mr. West, the District Commissioner, says there is now an "understanding between" these coal people. We know as a matter of fact, from the information given to us by the newspapers and others, the indisputable fact, that train load after train load of coal here a few years ago was held up just outside of the city limits while the people in the city of Washington were freezing to death in a land of plenty of coal, in this land of freedom, right underneath our flag, right in the shadow of the White House, and right at the doorway of this magnificent Chamber. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I just would like to ask the gentleman if there is any tariff on anthracite coal?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now, I will discuss that. There was some tariff on anthracite coal, yes; and I want to say that it was put on there, my dear sir, in such a way that a skilled surgeon like Professor Gross or Professor Agnew, or any other skilled surgeon, never cut a leg off more skillfully than that law was drawn by which foreign anthracite was excluded by the mere jugglery of words, and the people of this country pay the penalty. Mr. Secretary Moody said it was a jugglery of words by which anthracite coal was excluded, and as soon as we put it on the free list the price of coal went down, and I voted to put it on the free list, and I will do so again if given the chance.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman maintain that the coal trust is in existence because of the tariff on anthracite coal?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is in existence because of the infamous tariff law that you gentlemen are afraid to repeal, because you know the trust will turn you across its lap and spank you in the next election if you do. [Prolonged laughter and applause.] There is no politics in this. I am very sorry that this has been brought up. There is absolutely none in it, my friend.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that if this restriction which exists in the District of Columbia against using any coal that produces smoke were removed, so that bituminous coal could be used, we would overcome the difficulty?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And lower the prices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We can live with foul smoke and fan it out of our faces, but we can not live among a gang of coal cormorants [applause] who are not only holding up the District of Columbia in the prices of coal, but all the people of this District; and they are doing it right under the nose of the Attorney-General, and I presume they did it under the nose of the Attorney-General when he was a Democrat. I can rise above, and have heretofore, party politics, I hope, when it comes to looking up fraud and punishing evildoers and putting the rascals on the inside of the bars by the majesty of the law. I say that this committee owes it to itself to pass a resolution calling upon the Attorney-General and the District officers to look after this coal trust and break it. The statutes of the United States apply here in their splendid vigor. There is no local jurisdiction to interrupt. There is no trouble, but nonaction of law officers. They have plenty of money with which to prosecute. We have given you extra officers to do it, and I believe that the Attorney-General will do it if you will only bring it to his attention. [Applause.] Right there is one of the weaknesses of our law, that you put too much on the Attorney-General, and before you get this Sherman trust law enforced as it ought to be, you have to take the responsibility off him and give the people of this country, as you do when a man steals a chicken, the right to go before the grand jury and tell of these oppressive wrongs, instead of waiting for the Attorney-General to say yes or no.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee be permitted to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I beg the pardon of the committee; I do not willfully impose upon your patience.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I make an inquiry? Does the gentleman not understand that this whole question with relation to the law is being thrashed out now by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, we can not hear this conversation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I was asking the gentleman if he did not understand that this whole coal question was now being thrashed out by the Interstate Commerce Commission through the intervention of the Department of Justice, and largely upon a resolution or proceeding instituted by a distinguished gentleman from New York by the name of HEARST. That is the fact.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What I want to say is this, that while Mr. HEARST has been abused by almost everybody, he has done more to enforce the antitrust laws of this country than any man who has yet been Attorney-General, except the one now in the Attorney-General's office. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have not abused him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not say you had. I am not a HEARST man for President and never was, but I can render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. He is entitled to great credit, and I say he has done more than any private citizen against these great monopolies and trusts of this country. He is the only man I ever knew who took his own private funds to enforce these antitrust laws, and he did it well and won a great lawsuit. But I am diverging from my subject more than I wish to do. I say this great money committee of the nation owes it to the District of Columbia, owes it to the people of the United States, owes it to the Treasury of the United States, to call upon the Attorney-General or the district attorney here to take up this coal combination and crush it. This done, we will do away with these regular deficiencies and the people of this District and section will have cheaper coal. We will have obedience to the law; we will have the railroads punished as well as the railroad officials.

Mr. Chairman, no guilty man should escape in this matter. We are paying the penalty right now for letting them escape. They have always escaped, I believe, under Democratic as well as Republican rule, and it should be stopped, and quickly. Now, here is your time, gentlemen, to act, and stop the Treasury of the United States and the District being gouged in any such manner by these coal cormorants. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SMITH of Iowa having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolution of the following title:

On January 17, 1906:

H. J. Res. 68. Joint resolution relating to the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1905 to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep informed regarding compliance with the act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads, approved March 2, 1893, including the employment of inspectors to execute and enforce the requirements of the said act, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the purposes of said appropriation during the fiscal year 1906.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I inquire whether this appropriation was apportioned by the Commission?

Mr. LITTAUER. That appropriation was apportioned by the Commission to the work, and the balance left over from last year was $8,200. The Commission determined that they could use it to good advantage in enforcing this safety-appliance law. They said that they could reasonably state that a thousand men may attribute their life and ability to perform manual labor each year to the operation of this safety-appliance law. They came to us with much reluctance, but they found fields where they could use a larger sum of money than the average sum allotted under the $75,000 last year, which was the largest amount so far appropriated for this work.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then, if I understand it correctly, the Interstate Commerce Commission have in good faith complied with the provisions of the legislation of the last session to the satisfaction of the committee?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment. I will state to the gentleman from Maine there has been some doubt as to the constitutionality of the safety-appliance law, and last year the Supreme Court held it was constitutional. They will not need all this money; hence will not spend it, but turn it back to us.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. Do you know how much this unexpended balance is?

Mr. LITTAUER. Eight thousand two hundred dollars.

Mr. MANN. I understand the Interstate Commerce Commission has eighteen examiners under the safety-appliance act. There is not a large enough number. It is absolutely impossible to keep a proper inspection of the different railroads in the United States under the safety-appliance act under the appropriation which they have heretofore had, and I suppose this is to simply increase that amount and——

Mr. LITTAUER. Increase the number of inspectors in order that the law may be better enforced throughout the country.

Mr. MANN. It is to increase the efficiency of that service.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the efficiency of this service has already been demonstrated in a less number of accidents since this inspection began.

Mr. MANN. There can be no question about that, but I hope when the committee brings in an appropriation for this purpose for next year they will bring in an appropriation reasonably large enough to really carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. GRAFF. May I interrupt by saying the hearings show that Mr. Moseley stated that this appropriation was not asked for the purpose of increasing the number of men? He was asked how many men they wanted, and he replied that they wanted to keep the men they had, but they did not want to push any more on the committee or the Government, but he went on to state they did need more men, but they wanted to make the increase gradually.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand.

Mr. LITTAUER. The committee has always given the Interstate Commerce Commission the full sum for which they have asked. They gave them this year $75,000, last year $65,000, and the year before last $58,000—exactly as much as the Commission estimated they would be able to use.

Mr. TAWNEY. They estimate $85,000 for this year.

Mr. MANN. I think the Interstate Commerce Commission in this case has made too small an estimate. We reported out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce an act which recently passed, very much enlarging the work done by the Commission under this safety-appliance act. It is necessary that the railroads be inspected sufficiently to compel compliance with that act.

Mr. TAWNEY. They estimate for the coming fiscal year $85,000—$10,000 more than they estimated for the current fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. That would amount to what the current estimate and this deficiency will equal?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Army general hospital, Washington, D. C.: For the construction and completion of an Army general hospital in the District of Columbia, upon the site recently acquired for the purpose, within the present authorized limit of $200,000.

Mr. PALMER. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire when and where that act was passed.

Mr. LITTAUER. It was provided for in the sundry civil bill of last year and enacted into law March 3, 1905. The limit placed upon the construction of this hospital was $300,000, and $100,000 was appropriated last year. They come now and ask for the other $200,000 in order that a contract for the completed structure may be entered into. Of course, as usual, they asked us to extend the limit of cost another $100,000, but that we paid no attention to.

Mr. PALMER. I remember distinctly that it went out of the sundry civil bill on a point of order, and I would be glad to know how it got back again.

Mr. HULL. It went out of the Army appropriation bill on a point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It went in afterwards in the sundry civil bill, and the gentleman did not seem to catch on to the fact.

Mr. PALMER. Then it was sneaked into the sundry civil bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was put in the sundry civil bill by the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. That brings up an old question, that when a provision goes out of a bill in the House on a point of order, when it comes back here it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. It did not belong in the Army bill.

Mr. HULL. It was original legislation and would never belong to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It did not belong in any bill.

Mr. HULL. It should have been reported as a separate bill by the Committee on Military Affairs before it was in order on any appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the bad example of the Committee on Military Affairs was evidently followed by the committee on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman will remember that in answer to the other gentleman's question it was stated, when it comes back from the Senate we do not raise a point of order.

Mr. PALMER. Why can we not raise a point of order?

Mr. HULL. Because the Senate rules are not passed upon by the House of Representatives.

Mr. PALMER. Well, if there is one principle that is well settled it is that there is no appropriation that can be made except in pursuance to some existing law.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is existing law now.

Mr. PALMER. That law had never any right to be passed, and never ought to have been passed; and I do not believe it is good for anything.

Mr. LITTAUER. The law is there.

Mr. PALMER. It passed, as the gentleman admits, by some kind of chicanery or subterfuge or fraud, and that ends it.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it was passed because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], the "watchdog of the Treasury," lacked a little in eternal vigilance.

Mr. PALMER. I am not a "watchdog of the Treasury," but just wanted to know how this African got into the woodpile.

Mr. PAYNE. It was competent for him to strike it out of the sundry civil bill when it came back from the Senate, and to move on the floor of the House to strike it out.

Mr. PALMER. On the contrary, I am informed by very competent authority, to wit, the gentleman who has the bill in charge, that it would not have been in order to move to strike it out on a point of order when it came back from the Senate.

Mr. LITTAUER. Or go to conference.

Mr. PALMER. How much would that amount to?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania behind it, with all his eloquence.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire whether that appropriation was apportioned; and if apportioned, whether they gave any reason for any change in the apportionment, and why this $200,000 deficiency arises?

Mr. LITTAUER. I just want to read this clause from the law relating thereto:

For the purchase of a site for and toward the construction of an Army general hospital, $100,000, to be immediately available.

Now, how much did they apportion?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. How about the $220,000 deficiency?

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, as to the $200,000:

The total cost of said hospital, including site therefor, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed the sum of $300,000.

One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated and made immediately available. This is for the other $200,000, so that a contract may be made for the completion of this building.

The Clerk read as follows:

Military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.: For the following during so much of the last half of the fiscal year 1906 as may be necessary, namely: For 1 clerk, at the rate of $1,800 per annum; 1 clerk, at the rate of $1,400 per annum; 1 clerk, at the rate of $1,200 per annum; 5 foremen of mechanics, at the rate of $1,200 per annum each; 1 engineer, at the rate of $1,200 per annum; 1 teamster, at the rate of $720 per annum; 4 teamsters, at the rate of $360 per annum each; 2 night watchmen, at the rate of $360 per annum each; 1 fireman, at the rate of $720 per annum; extra-duty pay for prison guard, $1,140; in all, $8,740, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last word, so as to find out if these are new offices that are created, and if not, under what circumstances this deficiency arises.

Mr. LITTAUER. These are new offices, and created because of the conditions there. We had an old Army prison at Fort Leavenworth which was turned over to the Department of Justice, pending the erection of a new prison. The prison under the control of the Department of Justice is now completed and they desire to turn back to the Army the old prison. The Army state they need it immediately to hold their own prisoners and give a good reason why these new officers should be appointed, as they desire to have their prisoners segregated from the prisoners at the posts, so as to keep them from having a demoralizing effect on the soldiers at those places.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law requires that the prison be turned back to the Army.

Mr. LITTAUER. Moreover, when this old prison is turned over to the Army and is opened they will require there, besides the military people, a certain number of clerks, the clerk of the prison and a number of his assistants, to take care of the ordinary business of the prison.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So that these are permanent officials?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are permanent officials.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think I understand. This is an additional clerical force.

Mr. LITTAUER. Those included in this bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is legislation, of course, but I shall make no objection to it, although it would be subject to the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say to the gentleman from Maine that these officials heretofore have been under the Department of Justice. All those men who were employed in that prison under the Department of Justice have gone to the new prison and are employed by the Department of Justice at this time. The War Department must take possession of this old prison, and will reoccupy it again for its prisoners, and these officers are absolutely essential to the occupancy of the building or buildings by the War Department and the administration of the affairs of that Department.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is new legislation.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not new legislation. This prison was formerly in existence and was transferred to the Department of Justice. Now it is to be turned back to the War Department, and it is necessary to have these officials to take up the work there at the prison.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Independent of the legislation they would not have the officials and no right to employ them, would they?

Mr. LITTAUER. No.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not raise the point of order against it. I think the gentleman's explanation is adequate. I wanted to know the facts.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 16, insert the following: "The sum of $10,551.30 for the payment of injuries and damages caused by the explosion of detonating fuses on February 5, 1903, near Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., as found by a board of officers convened for the purpose."

Mr. LITTAUER. I make the point of order against that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MORRELL. I trust the gentleman will withhold his point of order for a moment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that all these people—I have their names here enumerated—who were injured, and one was killed outright, by this accident, which occurred in my district, are very poor people, dependent upon the labor of their own hands for their support. Many of the mothers of the children who were injured were dependent upon them for their subsistence. Surely there can be no more urgent deficiency than a debt like this. I have endeavored to get this matter before Congress for three years, ever since this accident occurred, but without success. Now, we all know what it will mean if this is relegated to the Court of Claims. These people will not get the money; besides they have not enough money to bring suit in the Court of Claims against the United States. I earnestly trust, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen in charge of this bill will out of charity to people who really need this money, not make the point of order against it. I really feel that here is a chance, where we are appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars, nay, millions of dollars, that we ought at least to take care of people who have through no fault of their own been injured by defective shells belonging to the War Department of the Government, to which we are now appropriating large sums of money under this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman does not make the point of order, I will.

Mr. MORRELL. Now, this matter was referred by the Secretary of the Treasury and was taken up by the Judge-Advocate-General, who in his report quoted precedents where legislation of a similar character had been enacted. For instance, when there was the explosion of a caisson in Chicago at the time of the Chicago riot, similar legislation was introduced and passed. This is a case, as I said before, where these people are actually in need, and I think it a disgrace to this Government that they should not be paid, particularly after a review of the case has been carefully made by the Judge-Advocate-General, where precedents have been cited, and where it has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I do hope and earnestly request that my friend from New York will in this instance be charitable and begin the new year aright by giving these people the little that belongs to them and which they really stand in need of.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must renew my point of order, without any——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

National trophy and prizes for Army and Militia: For the purpose of furnishing a national trophy and medals and other prizes to be provided and contested for annually, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, said contest to be open to the Army and the National Guard or organized militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia, and for the cost of the trophy, prizes, and medals herein provided for, being for the fiscal year 1904, $756.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order on this paragraph; not on the language of the bill, but on the hearings under which the appropriation was made. I know this is rather a peculiar way to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The hearings are not before the Chair.

Mr. HULL. I should like to have the gentleman tell the House why the committee made this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LITTAUER. The Army act of 1903 carried an appropriation for national trophy prizes for Army and militia to the amount of $2,500. The Army act did not provide for the expenses contingent to carrying on the competition. The War Department at that time had no range under its control to carry on such a competition, and consequently utilized by invitation the rifle range at Sea Girt, N. J., and there incurred certain expenses for scorers, markers, and statistical officers, and so on, necessary to conduct the competition. Consequently this deficiency, if so it can be called, comes before us here—a deficiency incurred in carrying out a work under the law.

Since that time the War Department has completed a range of its own, and all contingent expenses are now cared for out of various Army appropriations.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is in any sense a deficiency, but the language of the bill is undoubtedly in the line of what would be a deficiency, and I think, in place of saying anything on the point of order or instead of making a point of order, I will move to strike out the item, and I want to give my reason for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the section.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit an interruption?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have here the testimony of Captain Hutcheson on that item, on page 82 of the hearings:

It was an obligation incurred by the National Government. The cost of maintaining the range for the two or three days during which it was in use by the War Department for the purpose of allowing these teams to compete for this prize was naturally a charge against the Government. Personally I had nothing to do with the national board that year. The appropriation was $2,500 only, and, as I say, it being the first year, and this proposition being in its first inception, they overran their money. They had their money all spent for the trophy and had nothing left to pay this legitimate account for expenses.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think I am somewhat familiar with this whole question. Parties interested in marksmanship came to the Military Committee in 1903 and asked for an appropriation for medals to be competed for at a regular annual rifle meet. The statement was made and has been held ever since then that the whole amount went for the medals. Now I understand, two years after this has taken place, there is an appropriation asked for in this Congress, not for medals, but to help to keep up a rifle range. They speak about the Government not having a range then that they could use for this purpose. The Government has no range now accessible that they can use, and they used the Seagirt range on the invitation of the National Guard Association of the State of New Jersey and of the United States. It never was intended that the Government should pay anything out of its funds for the maintenance of the range, and there was no additional expense on account of this. They had these competitions, they had the shooting for prizes, they had all their paraphernalia of a contest between the Marine Corps, the Regular Army, and the National Guard, and all that Congress intended to do or did do, either then or since that time, has been to provide additional trophies to be shot for, and nothing else. If you pass this appropriation it will be an entering wedge for other appropriations for the last two years to pay the expenses of conducting the shoot. I do not know that I would object to doing that, but I want to do it openly and aboveboard, knowing what we are doing. Let them come before Congress and give the reasons why we should pay those expenses, and let Congress determine whether to do it or not.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if when this competition, covered by these items of deficiency, took place the Government had a rifle range suitable to conduct the competition for these trophies?

Mr. HULL. Just as much of a rifle range as it has now.

Mr. LITTAUER. Was the rifle range at Fort Riley?

Mr. HULL. They have had one at Fort Riley for the last five years.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why did the gentleman's committee appropriate $10,000, then?

Mr. HULL. Because we have improved it tremendously.

Mr. LITTAUER. Was it in a fair shape for troops coming from all over the United States?

Mr. HULL. It has been improved, and so have others. Let me ask the gentleman from New York if these shoots were at Fort Riley last year?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe they were at Fort Riley, according to the testimony we have.

Mr. HULL. They were at Sea Girt. I was invited to be present, and am sorry I could not attend.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Committee on Military Affairs gave them $4,000 instead of $2,000, and the expenses have all been paid.

Mr. HULL. Now, under this provision, if this is anything it is a claim; it is not a deficiency.

Mr. LITTAUER. A part of it is to make up a deficiency.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask whether this was an audited claim.

Mr. HULL. I think not; it has gone on for two years before they thought of it. They had a good time last year, and they said, "We will make this up to you."

Mr. LITTAUER. According to testimony before the committee, it is to make up the amount of deficiency for cash prizes.

Mr. HULL. We limited them to $2,500, and that is all they asked for. I submit to this House that when Congress passes an act and says how much they shall have they can not go out and spend twice as much and then come in here and get the balance of it under a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, has a point of order been reserved on this item?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has been reserved.

Mr. HULL. My motion was to strike out the provision.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I desire to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to make a point of order. The gentleman from Iowa distinctly stated that he made the point of order against the hearings and not against the wording of the bill, to which the Chair responded that the hearings were not before the Chair, and the gentleman from Iowa moved to strike out the provision, and has been discussing the motion to strike out.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he considers a claim of this kind of any higher dignity or whether it has any more right on an appropriation bill than a claim for the payment of damages incurred at West Point, Ky., as a result of the Army maneuvers?

Mr. HULL. I do not think it has anywhere near as much right.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that such an amendment was offered last session and objected to on the ground that it should go before the Committee on Claims. It seems to me this is the same character of a claim and ought to go there, as the other did.

Mr. HULL. If this was in order at all, it should have been brought in shortly after the maneuvers were held. They must have known of it then, and it was never thought of until the maneuvers were held last year.

Mr. LITTAUER. It was asked for as early as June 21, 1904, and the only reason that your committee have for inserting it is that this was at that time a new project. Two thousand five hundred dollars have been appropriated for prizes, and, according to the statement of those before us giving information on the matter, there was no place to hold this competition, and they willingly accepted an invitation of the people at Sea Girt.

Mr. HULL. It was understood where they were going to hold it when the appropriation was made; it was fairly understood then. I can see no reason on earth why they should go back and take it up now.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to say this in regard to this particular item. It may be a perfectly just item, but I do not believe an item of this kind ought to be put in an appropriation bill in this way simply because it happened to appeal to the committee, when other claims of equal dignity have no consideration. It is absolutely impossible, as every Member of this House knows, to get an ordinary claim, no matter how equitable it may be, through the Committee on Claims, and then through this House and the Senate, so as to become a law. The result is that an effort is often made to put them on appropriation bills of this nature. I have no objection if there was any sort of equity in the thing, but I have many times seen a refusal on the part of that committee to permit claims of a similar nature and of higher dignity than this to go upon appropriation bills.

And yet they come in here with no other excuse for breaking their universal rule than to say that they consider that this is a proper claim. Had I known that the point of order had not been saved I should certainly have saved it and then have made it, and I desire now to express the hope that this House will not permit this committee to disregard its own rule whenever it suits them and to then deny to individual Members not on the committee the power to put claims of this kind into an appropriation bill. I say that without meaning, of course, any reflection upon the committee, but because there is a principle involved. If the Committee on Appropriations is going to stick to that rule and relegate us to the Committee on Claims all the time, let it eat the food of its own making.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky I will say that this is not a claim. Congress has authorized this contest for these medals, and Congress appropriated $2,500 for that specific purpose. Now, there should be, and there is, a certain comity between the States and the Federal Government. The purpose of this law was to bring the National Guard of the States in contact with the Army officers in a contest of marksmanship. The War Department appoints a board to attend at this contest. The militia officers of the State of New Jersey, the Government not having a suitable place in which to carry on this contest, invited the Government there for the purpose of holding the contest, and I shall read what Captain Hutcheson says:

> I was not a member of the board at that time, but I fancy they were invited to go over there because there was no other range in the United States at that time big enough to accommodate so many.

Now, these delegations come from every State in the Union, and it requires very large accommodations. For that reason they selected this. The items which make up this deficiency, of course, are here. The authority being given for the holding of this contest, it necessarily carried with it the authority to employ all of the help that was necessary in order to carry it out. The items are as follows: There were three statistical officers for two days. It was an organization of the National Rifles Association. There were also two armorers for two days. The first cost $60, and the two armorers were $7.64. Scorers and markers, two days, $192; subsistence of officers on duty, two days, $80; entries and pools, carbine team, United States Army, $120.50; 96 targets, $104; amount advanced to make up deficiency, $2,500; cash prizes, $192.50; total, $756. Every one of these items here are items that are properly chargeable to the doing of that which Congress had authorized and for which it failed to make a sufficient appropriation. Therefore it is not a claim, but it is an actual deficiency.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him if he recalls the action of Congress in authorizing Army maneuvers at various points in America, among others at Westpoint, Ky.?

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand there was an act of that kind.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman recalls that there was damage done to the farms and crops on the farms of that section of the country and that the War Department appointed a commission——

Mr. TAWNEY. This is the first information I have had on that subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I should like to tell the gentleman that the War Department authorized a commission to adjust the amount of damages. They did adjust it. They reported the amount, and yet the committee of which the gentleman is chairman refused to permit a claim of that kind, identical with the claim that the gentleman has here—on all fours with it; it had been authorized by Congress—to go upon this appropriation bill, and referred us to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have the utmost respect for the gentleman's legal attainments, but he must certainly see a distinction between a claim for damages occasioned in the carrying out of that which Congress may have authorized and an appropriation for the payment of a part of the expenses in the doing of that which Congress has authorized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is useless to discuss the point of order. The gentleman well knows that if it was in order to make it we would not have to discuss the merit of the provision very long. The point I want the committee to understand is that the Committee on Appropriations is making a rule for the rest of the House that when it suits its purpose it disregards.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is unjust to the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose they can not very well defend themselves—in fact, they do not need any defense—but the gentleman is entirely mistaken, because that gentleman makes here clearly a claim, without any question, against the Government for damages. It is not only a claim, but it is not a legal claim, one which can not be enforced against the Government except by the grace of Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can any claim be enforced except by grace?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly; most claims can be enforced against the Government through the Court of Claims; probably this claim can be. It is not a matter of grace at all. While it requires an appropriation by Congress, it is not a matter of grace from Congress to pay a bill that Congress is obligated to pay under the law. There is no matter of grace about it at all; but a claim for damages against the Government is purely a matter of grace because there is no law providing for the payment. Now, whether this should be paid or not I do not know, but the Committee on Appropriations is not subject to the criticism which the very distinguished and able lawyer from Kentucky has made and which he will appreciate as well as anybody if he stops and reflects, but I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill why this amount did not come in before?

Mr. LITTAUER. Why it did not come in before I can not tell, but it did come in this year with the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Iowa charges that it never was thought of until last summer.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have a letter here before me dated Passaic, N. J., June 21, 1904, wherein request is made for this repayment to the New Jersey State Rifle Association.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member, should not incorporate upon appropriation bills items in violation of the rules of the House. I have prevented it doing that before I was a member of the committee, and I shall, as far as I am able, prevent it from doing it in the future. The work of the Committee on Appropriations is to make appropriations in pursuance of laws already in existence. Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky will give me his attention for a moment, this item incorporated in this bill is to provide for incidental expenses of a rifle match that was authorized by Congress. Had it been known when this match was authorized that these expenses incident to the proper conduct of it would have been incurred provision would undoubtedly have been made at that time for their payment. This item does not now come here for the first time. It was sent by the authorities of the State of New Jersey to the Secretary of War last year. Instead of communicating with the Committee on Appropriations he had somebody, if I am correctly informed, introduce a bill to reimburse that State, and in the great mass of bills which are introduced here from year to year that bill was lost. The amendment of which the gentleman from Kentucky is complaining because it was ruled out on the point of order is in an entirely different category. Congress authorized the holding of Army maneuvers, and I am certain that if anybody had imagined that as a result of those maneuvers great damage would have been done to the farms or other property of private citizens of the country the maneuvers would not have been authorized.

Mr. SHERLEY. They not only contemplated, but stipulated with these people that they would pay for any damage that was done, and the Government has not kept its word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Congress did not make that stipulation. It may have been a stipulation by somebody in the Department who had no authority to make the stipulation, but nobody in this House, so far as I know, knew that these damages would result. Most of those who were Members of the House supposed that the maneuvers would be held in those parts of the country where no damage would result. I am quite confident that this item now under consideration is properly in the bill, and I do not think it is subject to the criticism which the gentleman from Kentucky levels at it.

Mr. HULL. One minute, Mr. Chairman. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York when the War Department called the attention of Congress to this appropriation. He says New Jersey called it to the attention of the War Department in 1904. When did the War Department think it was a good thing to send up here?

Mr. LITTAUER. As far as I know, sir, on December 5, 1905; but it had been before the War Department since June 21, 1904.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, one word further. The gentleman from Minnesota says that the appropriation for medals carried with it whatever was necessary to conduct the contest. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to submit to this House that when that question was before the Committee on Military Affairs it was specifically stated that the whole amount of money could go to medals and that the contest would take place and this would be simply an additional incentive for men to do their best. We made the same appropriation last year and the year before, increasing the amount.

Mr. LITTAUER. Why did you raise it to $4,000 the year following?

Mr. HULL. Because they said they wanted to give better prizes.

Mr. MADDEN. If it was proper and legitimate to make it $4,000, what is the objection to this?

Mr. HULL. The language of the appropriation was not changed, as I remember, and it was never claimed that a dollar of it went to anybody except to purchase the medals and prizes to be shot for. Take the National Guard of my own State. There they have an annual meet. A great many gentlemen have given prizes. It stimulates the desire of the militia to qualify as expert marksmen. But no one that made a present of a prize ever dreamed that he would have to pay part of the expense of conducting the shoot.

Mr. TAWNEY. The State does that.

Mr. HULL. The State does that, and the State and the War Department together conducted this, and if we had not appropriated a cent in the way of additional inducements for these parties to compete they would have conducted the contest just the same for everything except the shoots for the special prizes. There would have been as many shots fired and as much time expended. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in so sense is this a deficiency. In no sense should it have been in this bill, and if the language——

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. HULL. If the language had been framed to pay the money for the purposes that the gentleman from New York says it is to be paid for, a point of order would have laid against it; but the language is so adroitly put in here that it does not disclose what it is to be paid for. The hearings only tell that. The bill is simply the same as the original act making the appropriation of $2,500.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the gentleman admit that the sum of $192.50 paid is a deficiency in the original appropriation made for the cash prizes?

Mr. HULL. I do not recognize that they have any right to exceed the appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no law of that kind. Congress gave them what they asked for, namely, $2,500. If you allow them to exceed $2,500 you can allow them to exceed $100,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not that be true in other instances?

Mr. HULL. This is not a law providing for the current expenses of the Government. It is a specific thing for a specific purpose. I hope the committee will strike it out.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the limit on this paragraph, twenty minutes, has been reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I made the point of order that the limit on this paragraph has been reached.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no debate on the motion to strike out the last word. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] for that purpose.

Mr. PRINCE. On page 83 of the hearings we find this:

Mr. LITTAUER. Was this entirely expended for medals?
Captain HUTCHESON. In that particular year it was.
Mr. LITTAUER. The act only refers to expenditures for medals.
Captain HUTCHESON. The first act did, Mr. Chairman.

Now, what was the purpose of this appropriation? Solely for medals as prizes at Seagirt. There was no purpose at the time when this appropriation was made and these gentlemen appeared before the Military Committee to use this money for any other purpose than for medals. Two years have passed, and now they come in. We are criticising men for asking for appropriations, and asking too much. There is a greater necessity for this criticism when men come before a committee and ask money for a certain purpose and then want to use it for some other purpose. It seems to me if there ever has been presented to this committee a proposition that they ought to vote in favor of, it is to vote in favor of striking out this claim in effect. I hope that the committee of this House will stand by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the members of the committee when they say that the purpose for which this money was appropriated was one thing, and that they now seek to use it in a deficiency for another and distinct purpose. It is time for the House to stand by the committees and insist that when money is appropriated for a purpose they shall not come into this House and seek to use it for something else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for the debate on this amendment has closed. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HULL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to Indiana State board of agriculture: To pay the Indiana State board of agriculture the actual value of the use, occupation, and damage to their property by the United States military authorities for Government purposes during the war with Spain, as ascertained under the act approved April 7, 1904, and reported to Congress in House Document No. 48 of this session, $7,431.88.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations this question: Has the Comptroller of the Treasury been before your committee in regard to these deficiency appropriations?

Mr. TAWNEY. He has not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the law that prohibits a head of a Department from expending more money than is appropriated, how is it possible, if the Comptroller of the Treasury discharges his duty, that he can give warrants to use that money?

Mr. TAWNEY. Some of these appropriations are for fiscal years preceding the year when the law was enacted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Some of them are anticipated deficiencies for the current fiscal year. The deficiencies for the fiscal years 1904 and 1905 the law does not apply to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. When did this law pass?

Mr. TAWNEY. By the last Congress. Now, the deficiencies for the fiscal year 1906, to which this law applies, have not occurred, except perhaps in a very few cases, such as the appropriation for fuel for the schools of the District of Columbia. I do not know that that yet exists, but there are anticipated deficiencies—deficiencies that will occur before the end of the fiscal year—and they are carried in this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say that none of these deficiencies have been created since the law was passed.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is my recollection, I would say to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ALEXANDER. So that it would not come before the Comptroller of the Treasury for action?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. STERLING. I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill with reference to the paragraph just read, "Payment to Indiana State board of agriculture." Is it usual for States to make claims of that kind where the Army has occupied State buildings?

Mr. LITTAUER. I would say that this is not subject to the point of order, because we have not been authorized by law to consider this matter.

Mr. STERLING. I presume that nearly every State could make similar claim. Have other States made claims like this one?

Mr. LITTAUER. None have been before us.

Mr. TAWNEY. Congress passed a law authorizing the adjudication of this claim, and the law required the amount found to be due to be certified to Congress for payment.

Mr. HEPBURN. What was the claim?

Mr. TAWNEY. The claim is for the use of grounds by the Government at the time of the Spanish war.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is simply an amount sent to us in accordance with the law requiring that this claim should be adjudicated. It has been adjudicated under the act passed April 7, 1904, entitled "An act for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture." The Assistant Secretary of War, under the terms of the law passed in April, 1904, investigated and reported to the Secretary of the Treasury that this amount was equitably and justly due to the State board of agriculture for the use of, occupation, and damage to this property in accordance with the law.

Mr. STERLING. I assume that the property used and occupied were the buildings on the State fair grounds. Is that true?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know about that. I know that the law directed that this should be done, that these findings should be made, and have been made by the Assistant Secretary of War and reported to the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. We know nothing about the merits of the claim. That was considered by the Congress that authorized the Secretary of War to adjudicate the claim.

Mr. STERLING. One more question. Is the amount itemized? How much is given for the use and occupation of the property and how much for the damage?

Mr. LITTAUER. It simply reads that the Secretary of War has directed the case to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department, the circumstances, character, and extent of the alleged use, occupation, and damage by the United States military authority, and then gives the final awarding, which is certified to the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount which is equitably due to the State of Indiana board of agriculture, as to the reasonable value of such use, occupation, and damage. The Secretary of War acted under that law, and we are simply advised of the amount, and the estimate for the amount is stated in the bill. It comes to us as a certified deficiency.

Mr. BURLESON. The Quartermaster-General's Department "finds the amount of $7,431.88 is equitably due the said Indiana State board of agriculture, as the reasonable value of the use, occupation, and damage to the same."

Mr. STERLING. Has the amount been paid?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; we are attempting to appropriate for it now.

Mr. STERLING. I assume they come here for these items that have already been paid and they are covered in this bill. Is not that true?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; how can they be paid until an appropriation is made?

Mr. STERLING. With reference to the item for this portrait, that has already been paid.

Mr. LITTAUER. It was paid out of the contingent fund. The contingent fund had sufficient money in it to pay that, and now they come to us for an additional appropriation in order to restore the amount that has been taken out of the general contingent fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky raises a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. SHERLEY. I reserve it for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves his point of order.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to ask another question. I asked the chairman a question on Saturday with reference to one of these items covered in the provisions of this bill that has been paid. What would be the result if Congress refuse to allow that item, striking that item from the bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. After a payment has been made, by refusing further amounts of deficiency you compel the Department to live within the sums already appropriated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is not a deficiency. It is like any other claim against the Government, and there is no reason why it should be included in a deficiency appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is the character of claim or item that it is customary to put into deficiency bills. It has over and over again been held that such an item is in order on a deficiency bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT—PAY DEPARTMENT.

For mileage to officers and contract surgeons, when authorized by law, $50,000: Provided, That out of the sum herein appropriated mileage shall be allowed in accordance only with the following rule in cases where the station of an officer is changed while he is on leave of absence, to wit, that he shall be allowed mileage on joining his new station for the distance to the new station from the place where he received the order directing the change: Provided, That the distance is not greater than that from the old station to the new station; but if the distance be greater he shall be entitled to mileage for a distance equal to that from the old to the new station only.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I raise a point of order. I should like to have the Chair rule on it after I make an inquiry. I am not familiar with the law. On the face of it this proviso is legislation. Is there any law now that provides for mileage under those circumstances? If not, it is new legislation. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state to the gentleman that there is a law governing the payment of mileage to commissioned officers and contract surgeons. Until a few months ago the officer, when on leave of absence, receiving an order assigning him to a new station could not collect mileage and did not collect mileage from the point where he received the order to the new station; but under a recent ruling by the Comptroller of the Treasury Department the officer is held to be entitled to his mileage now from the point where he receives the order changing his station to the new station, instead of mileage from the old station to the new station, as theretofore.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit a question right there——

Mr. TAWNEY. The purpose of this is to limit the expenditure of this appropriation to the payment of mileage to the point where he receives the order directing him to go to the new station, provided the distance from that point to the new station is no greater than from the old station to the new station. For example, the Paymaster-General informed the committee that this decision of the Comptroller has cost the Government of the United States, on account of additional mileage, an amount, in his judgment, equal to about $20,000, which otherwise the officers could not have collected or would not have received. Under the present practice if an officer is on leave in San Francisco and his station is Fort Riley and he receives an order while in San Francisco to go to some station in Maine he collects mileage from San Francisco, although he is there on his own business or on a vacation. He collects mileage from San Francisco to Maine, whereas under this limitation he could only collect from Fort Riley, the place of his then station or the one that he recently left, to the new station to which he has been assigned; and to that extent it is a limitation upon the expenditure of this appropriation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Although in effect a change of law, under the explanation of the gentleman I would withdraw the point of order in any event, because I think it is a good provision.

I withdraw the point of order now.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to get some information from the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. I do not think from the reading of this paragraph that you have established a standard of such justice as the Government ought to administer to its officers. I can not understand the theory or sense of justice which prevails in this rule, which declares that when an officer of the Federal Army, as is frequently done, goes to his home, knowing that he is going to receive an order to change stations, why you should punish him for exercising his natural affection in going to see his people before he goes to the new station that he knows he is going to be assigned to, knowing that the notification of it will come to him while he is at home enjoying his leave of absence. This rule requires him not to be allowed any mileage from his home to the new station, but he must be allowed mileage only according to the distance from the old station to the new one. In a great many instances that would operate to do very great wrong and very great injustice. It looks to me as though, the officer being at his home with the consent of the Government on a leave of absence, the Government should be liberal and fair enough, if the distance from his home where he receives the notice of the change of station is greater than that from the old station to the new station, that he ought to be allowed, in justice and fairness, the additional mileage, because he is there with the consent of the Government. He has received permission to go there. And it looks to me as though the House of Representatives, Mr. Chairman, ought to be quite liberal on that line about mileage. It is a cheeseparing business that it seems to me the Government ought not to enter into.

Mr. MACON. Does the gentleman from Alabama think it a proper thing to do, if an officer is stationed in New York for the time being and is aware of the fact that in a very short time he is going to be changed to Chicago, his family being at El Paso, Tex., that he should be paid mileage if he packs up his traps and goes down to El Paso to see his family and be prepared to receive the change?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If the Government gives him leave of absence on application and he goes home, and while stationed at his home notice comes that his station has been changed, I think equity, justice, and fairness ought to give him an additional mileage from the point where he receives his notice to the station where he is assigned. I believe it is only fair and just. Of course you may state a condition of facts that might imply fraud. Such is not in my contemplation.

Mr. MACON. The Government pays mileage to its Representatives from their homes to Congress. Suppose the gentleman's family had gone to California and he desired to see them just before coming on to Washington on the first Monday in December, does he think it would be right for the Government to pay his mileage from California to Washington?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That does not apply to this case at all. There is no similitude whatever in the question the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] asks and what I am contending for. A Congressman asks for no furlough.

Mr. MACON. If that would not be right, why should you pay an officer who had done a similar thing?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear an explanation in full from the gentleman in charge of the bill. He must have a good reason for putting this in. I do not know what it is, but I would like to hear it, and if not, I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; and I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from and including the word "Provided," at the end of the twenty-first line, down to and including the word "only," at the end of the twenty-fifth line.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. If that amendment is voted down, would a motion to amend that section still be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. This is simply an amendment changing the section. If that is voted down, another amendment would be in order.

Mr. HULL. But this is an amendment to strike out the last proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa desires to offer an amendment perfecting the proviso, he must offer it now.

Mr. HULL. And if the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is voted down, my amendment perfecting the proviso would not be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Iowa desires to perfect the proviso which the gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to ask a question, and then, perhaps, I may not want to offer my amendment. Under this proviso has the Government protected itself under the provisions of the appropriation bill that it must be computed by the shortest usual traveled route? Does the gentleman from New York think that this language would cover it? And in that same connection, the provision for mileage in appropriation bills contains a provision taking into consideration the land-grant railroads—that is to say, a man under orders from here to San Francisco would get mileage by the nearest usual traveled route and have a deduction of 50 per cent on all bond-aided or land-grant railroads.

Mr. LITTAUER. Such a provision would still be maintained, unquestionably, and as to the shortest route between the old station and the new, I would take it for granted that there would be no real force in the provision if it did not mean by the shortest route.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state, in addition to what my colleague on the committee has said, that this proviso does not change the existing law for the payment of mileage out of any appropriation heretofore made or that may hereafter be made, and in so far as it is a limitation on this appropriation, the same laws and the same construction of laws would apply, with the exception of an officer on leave receiving an order changing his station, which to-day is construed that he is entitled to mileage from the new point to the old. When he is allowed mileage under this limitation, it would have to be construed under existing law—that is, he would be entitled to mileage travel by the shortest route of travel; there is no question about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does the gentleman mean to say that striking out the proviso, as my amendment does, does not affect the preceding provision?

Mr. TAWNEY. Of course it affects the preceding provision. The preceding appropriation is an appropriation of $50,000. Now, at the present time, in view of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, I may be pardoned for saying that when an officer is on leave he is away on his own business, or away on a vacation for recreation; he is not at that point on the business of the Government. Now, then, why should the Government pay his expenses back to the old station, as the gentleman from Alabama suggests, or why should the Government pay him 7 cents a mile from the point where he has received the order directing him to go somewhere else, providing that distance is greater than the distance between the old station and the new, which he would otherwise have to travel on the business of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does the gentleman not recognize this theory and practice in military matters of the Government, that it has occurred that when men were absent on furloughs things have occurred that allowed them to come in as participants in various funds, pensions, etc.?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in fairness thinks that he should first recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment before we vote on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] after the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the motion is to strike out this clause relating to the mileage of officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The second proviso only, from line 21.

Mr. KEIFER. It is to that that I desire to offer an amendment; after the word "change," in line 21, insert "provided he is not required to return to the station from whence he was ordered."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not an amendment to the section that the gentleman wishes to strike out.

Mr. KEIFER. It is an amendment, however, to the text that we are considering.

The CHAIRMAN. If that text were stricken out, the motion of the gentleman from Ohio would still be acted upon.

Mr. KEIFER. The motion is a part of that provision. I will reserve it, then.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "only," in line 25, insert the following: "subject to the same restrictions as to the shortest, usual traveled route and compensation over bond or land-grant aided roads as now provided by law."

Mr. LITTAUER. We will accept that amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet the floor. The gentleman from Iowa has offered an amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand fully that amendment.

Mr. HULL. My amendment is that parties traveling either from their homes or from their stations, traveling over bond-aided roads, should receive only the compensation now provided by law, which is 50 per cent of the total amount.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] yield for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor.

Mr. PERKINS. Has nobody the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. Nobody has the floor.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I move to strike out the last word, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] at what rate mileage is allowed?

Mr. TAWNEY. Seven cents a mile.

Mr. PERKINS. Is that the general provision of the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that is a pretty liberal rate in these days?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, it has been the rate for a good many years. The Committee on Appropriations has no power in the premises, however.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that must pay any officer three times, on the average, what his transportation costs him?

Mr. TAWNEY. I hardly think it would.

Mr. PERKINS. It costs him only from 2 to 3 cents a mile.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman's question should be addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which has jurisdiction of the legislation on this subject.

Mr. LITTAUER. What is the bearing of the amendment on the amount the Government would have to expend?

Mr. HULL. When the Government paid the actual expenses it came to more than 7 cents a mile, but now a man ordered from here to New York gets 7 cents a mile, and he pays his own Pullman-car fare and his meals and his extra expenses at the hotel.

Mr. PERKINS. All of these expenses are included?

Mr. HULL. Everything, and it is a very low rate. I will say that the Naval Committee came in three years ago, I think, and got 8 cents a mile, which was considered a fair rate.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, if I can not be heard against the pending amendment, I desire to make a formal motion.

I am in sympathy with the purpose of this provision of the bill, and the amendment that I propose to make I think will eliminate the danger of doing wrong that the language here is likely to produce. It is too arbitrary in this that if this bill should become a law in the language used it would cut off an officer from receiving mileage from his proper station from whence he was ordered to another, provided he were on leave of absence at his own expense and was obliged to return at his own expense to the original station. Suppose a man were stationed in the city of San Francisco—and I have the case exactly in mind—and he obtains, after years of time spent in that country and one year at Valdez, in Alaska, thirty days' leave of absence to go to his home in Ohio at his own expense. While there he receives an order from the War Department to change his station from San Francisco to Fort Hunt, on the Potomac just below Alexandria. Now, if he is required to go back to his original station——

Mr. LITTAUER. Required by whom?

Mr. KEIFER. Because he has everything there at his station. His order comes not to change stations where he is visiting in Ohio, but to change stations from California. It happens to reach him by mail in Ohio, where he is required to report his post-office address. Now, if he is obliged to go at his own expense to California, ship and move from there to Alexandria, Va., then, under this bill, he would draw his pay from a point in Ohio to Alexandria, Va., only.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will you permit a question right there?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. He is in Ohio subject to his own will, is he not?

Mr. KEIFER. He is there on leave of absence. He might have been in Honolulu.

Mr. LITTAUER. He may have been in Honolulu or could have remained in San Francisco.

Mr. KEIFER. But he is on leave of absence at his own expense.

Mr. LITTAUER. And consequently, having gone where he chose to go, he asks the Government to reimburse him to go back to where he was originally stationed.

Mr. KEIFER. Nobody suggested that, and that is not the law. If the gentleman had listened, he would not have asked the question. He did not leave San Francisco at the Government's expense, he does not go back to San Francisco at the Government's expense, but after receiving the order to go from San Francisco to Alexandria, Va., he may be obliged, at his own expense, to go back to San Francisco, and under the language of this bill he would only get mileage from a point in Ohio, where he received the order, to Alexandria, Va.

Mr. LITTAUER. But is he obliged to go back to San Francisco except for his own convenience? Is there any public duty requiring him to go back?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; there may be. Suppose he had not obtained leave of absence.

Mr. LITTAUER. But he is on leave of absence.

Mr. KEIFER. But what I propose is to add, after the word "change," in line 21, this language:

Provided he is not required to return to the station from whence he was ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. This would only give him mileage in the case I put provided the Government required him to go back to his original station and from that station to the new one.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, if the Government requires him to go back to the original station he would be ordered there.

Mr. KEIFER. Under the present law that is true, but under the bill it is ironclad that he could not get it. Now, if the gentleman will look at the bill he will agree with me that he will be only entitled to mileage from the point in Ohio where he was on leave when he got the notice. I want to say the gentleman is mistaken about an officer on leave being entitled to have the Government pay his expenses back to the station from whence he went at the time he went on leave. That is always at his own expense. The Government never pays that.

Mr. LITTAUER. But will you not admit if he be required to go back to San Francisco that that is an order of the Department that he go there? If the Government subsequently ordered him from San Francisco to Fort Hunt that is a second order, and therefore he would be entitled to mileage from both orders.

Mr. KEIFER. I have to say that that is the law now, but if this bill passes and this language is used, then he would not, for this is the language:

He shall be allowed mileage on joining his new station for the distance to the new station from the place where he received the order directing the change.

Now, that is clearly all that he can get under this proposed law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If that is the case surely we will not pass that bill; but is it the case?

Mr. KEIFER. Well, let the gentleman look at the bill himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] is recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the theory of this provision, it is based alone upon this idea, that because an officer of the United States Army is allowed a furlough, or leave of absence, as is allowed in all armies since the beginning of civilization, and having accepted that leave of absence and being at home, and his station is changed while he is on leave of absence from the one that he left to one at a greater distance, therefore he must not be allowed mileage except upon equal distance between the old station and the new one. If it happens to be that the new station to which he is ordered is 500 miles farther than the old station is from the new, then he is not allowed any mileage for that. Now, it occurs to me, as I have said before, Mr. Chairman, that the theory upon which the committee has constructed this rule is not good in justice nor is it so in equity, nor does it apply, as a rule, in a great many other matters pertaining to matters of interest in this Government. It frequently comes up, even in the matter of pensions and in the matter of increase of pensions, or granting a pension for disability, as to whether the soldier was on leave of absence, if he was at home, and not in the line of the discharge of his duty. The Pension Committee has long since abandoned that technical, unjust, and unreasonable rule, and I invoke the same spirit, Mr. Chairman, in the construction of this rule by the committee as is invoked in these other important matters of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has put the matter strongly in the instance that he has given. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio grants some relief from the hardships created by the rule prescribed by the committee. I am not advised that the rules and regulations require the soldier to go back to the station in order to get another start to reach his new station. I should think not. He might have all of his baggage and luggage and everything of that kind transferred from the old station to the new one. What I am complaining of is the inequitable rule, the injustice done to the officer. Having received the consent of the Government and his superior officer to enjoy a furlough, and a change of station comes to him while he is on that furlough, it seems to me to be just and right, if he recives that order at the place of the leave of absence, that he be allowed, in all fairness, if the distance is greater from his home to the new station than from the old station to the new one, the difference in the mileage. What became of my amendment, Mr. Chairman; it seems to have been lost sight of?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is the motion offered by the gentleman from Iowa to perfect this provision prior to a motion to strike the whole thing out.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the gentlemen of the committee who criticise the language and who think they improve it by the amendment offered, that I do not agree with them. This matter was brought to the attention of the Secretary of War when he appeared before the committee on another subject. And at my request he submitted this amendment or limitation upon this appropriation. In the letter transmitting it to me he says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 16, 1906.

MY DEAR Mr. TAWNEY: In your item of $100,000 in the urgent deficiency bill for mileage of officers and contract surgeons, I beg to suggest a proviso in order to avoid a ruling already made by the Comptroller under existing law by which when an officer is ordered from one station to another and at the time of receiving the order is on vacation at some third point he is entitled to mileage from that third point to the station to which he is ordered. If this is the proper construction of the law, it should be changed. His being at the third point is due to his own volition and not to the discharge of any duty or any order from the War Department, and the mileage that he should be permitted is only the mileage from the station at which he is stationed to that to which he is ordered. I suggest, therefore, that in the urgent deficiency bill, in order to avoid the result of this construction, there be added the following proviso:

"Provided, That out of the sum herein appropriated mileage shall be allowed in accordance only with the following rule in cases where the station of an officer is changed while he is on leave of absence, to wit: That he shall be allowed mileage on joining his new station for the distance to the new station from the place where he received the order directing the change: Provided, That the distance is not greater than that from the old station to the new station; but if the distance be greater, he shall be entitled to mileage for a distance equal to that from the old to the new station only."

The responsibility for the language of that proviso is not with the committee, except so far as we have adopted it. We, however, approve it and believe it should be enacted into law. It was the desire of the subcommittee that this proviso should be prepared by those who were charged with the duty of administering this law. I think, Mr. Chairman, the necessity for this proviso is admitted by almost every Member of this House, and as the department having charge of the administration of the law in respect to mileage suggests it, the House ought to be willing to accept it. In doing so we will put a stop to an abuse which has cost the Government of the United States this fiscal year about $20,000, according to the testimony of the Paymaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, to strike out that paragraph.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend by striking out all the paragraph after the word "the," beginning with the word "place," in line 20, and inserting the words "old station." That cures the difficulty that is suggested by the Secretary of War. That does not permit the mileage from the new station, but simply gives to the officer the mileage that he would be entitled to had he not separated himself from his old station through a leave of absence. I think that is right and fair.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the law now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that that is in a sense not an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama now pending.

Mr. HEPBURN. It perfects the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It strikes that out and more. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama simply strikes out from the word "Provided," in line 21.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I was too far away and could not hear the gentleman's amendment. Will the gentleman from Iowa tell me what his amendment is?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is simply to strike out all after the word "the," preceding the word "place," in line 20, and all the following portion of the paragraph, and insert the words "old station."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa strikes out all that the gentleman from Alabama proposes to strike out and some more.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thought the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama was to strike out the proviso.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is my amendment. Yours can be made to it, it seems to me.

Mr. HEPBURN. The proviso began on line 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is the pending question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I will reserve this amendment until that is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEPBURN. If this should be adopted, then the gentleman will not object to striking these words out?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not at all. That is what I am getting at.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I will request the gentleman to temporarily withdraw his amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will withdraw it temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done except by unanimous consent. The amendment has been amended and the question is on its adoption. The text has been amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the motion to strike out? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Now the gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Strike out the word "place" and all following to the conclusion of the paragraph and insert the words "old station."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, after the word "the," before the word "place," strike out the word "place" and the remainder of the paragraph and insert the words "old station."

Mr. KEIFER. Now, with a view of perfecting this clause, I move to insert, after the word "change," in line 21, the words "provided he is not required to return to the station from whence he was ordered."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, after the word "place," insert "provided he is not required to return to the station from whence he was ordered."

Mr. MADDEN. I move to amend the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are exhausted.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand this is an original amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. To perfect the bill before the motion to strike out. I think the gentleman is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is in order.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to amend the amendment by making it read—provided he is not required by the War Department to return to the original place—to insert the word "required."

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that will be considered as a part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LITTAUER. I should like to understand how the amendment will now read.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend so as to read: "Provided, That he is not required by the War Department to return to the station from whence he was ordered."

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this observation with reference to the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa. If his motion should prevail, then the clause on the subject of mileage will be entirely unnecessary, because that would leave the law just as it is now. They get mileage from the station from whence they are ordered to the new station. There is no dispute about that. I am in harmony with the bill, and I only want to avoid doing injustice by the ironclad language it contains. I call attention to the language, which is without condition or qualification:

He shall be allowed mileage on joining his new station, for the distance of the new station from the place where he receives the order directing the change.

That excludes absolutely the possibility of his getting mileage from the old station to the new, although by the very language of the order changing the station he may be obliged to go there to conduct troops or move materials of war from that place to the new station. Although he does that he will get no mileage under this clause, if it becomes a law, and may have to go at his own expense to a station farther away than where he receives the order, traveling, perhaps, over the same ground both ways at his own expense and drawing only a small amount of mileage for a part of the distance; so that if my amendment is adopted, it will carry out, I think, the purpose that was designed by the Secretary of War and still do no injustice to officers. The Secretary of War prepared the amendment without, perhaps, taking everything into view. He is a good Secretary of War, and he knows a lot about things in the Army, but he does not know everything until he has an opportunity to examine it in all its bearings. I am perfectly certain that this will cure all the difficulty that might arise and think it ought to be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KEIFER) there were—ayes 3, noes 18.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEPBURN. In place of the amendment that I have offered, I will offer the following: To insert, before the word "place," in line 20, the words "old station, if he shall return to his old station, but if he shall not return to his old station, then the mileage to be allowed shall be that from the place where he received the order directing the change," and so forth.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert before the word "place," in line 20, the following: "old station, if he shall return to the old station; but if he shall not return to his old station, then the mileage to be allowed shall be that from the——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me that would be tantamount to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], which was just voted down.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not exactly that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss it?

Mr. LITTAUER. No.

The question being taken on the amendment, on a division (demanded by Mr. HEPBURN) there were—ayes 9, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Burial of indigent soldiers: For expenses of burying in the Arlington National Cemetery, or in the cemeteries of the District of Columbia, indigent ex-Union soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late civil war and soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain who die in the District of Columbia or in the immediate vicinity thereof, and of such soldiers, sailors, and marines who die in the District of Columbia and are buried in the immediate vicinity thereof, to be disbursed by the Secretary of War, at a cost not exceeding $45 for such burial expenses in each case, exclusive of cost of grave, on account of the fiscal year 1905, $500.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, when the general debate was on it was suggested that when the deficiency in connection with the isthmian canal was reached that a certain amount of time be given for general debate on that item. As we have now reached that paragraph I would like to ask unanimous consent that there now be opportunity for general debate in connection with the item for the isthmian canal one hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the other half by myself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let us make it an hour and a half, three-quarters of an hour on each side.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that there be one hour and a half for general debate on the item in relation to the isthmian canal, beginning on page 14, line 20, and continuing to page 16, line 8, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr LIVINGSTON] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. With the understanding that it does not interfere with the reading of the paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not; it is general debate; debate under the five-minute rule could not be closed under that order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much time is asked?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-five minutes on each side. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, on the assembling of this Congress the Secretary of War submitted the necessity of an emergency appropriation of $16,500,000 to carry on the work of the isthmian canal. Congress on December 21 passed an act appropriating $11,000,000 for that purpose, and the Secretary of War now comes to Congress asking practically for the balance of his original estimate on the following statement: The $16,500,000 was designed first to pay the indebtedness existing on the 1st of December, 1905. That indebtedness consisted of $4,000,000 on general account and $500,000 due to the Panama Railroad Company. He then estimated for the continuance of the work of construction and general purchase based upon the actual expenditures of the month of October, 1905. It has been found by comparison that the expenditures in October were a fair basis, as those of September and November aggregated under each of the heads of disbursement about the same amount. Based upon that original calculation, practically without any change, we are now asked to provide $5,340,786, which amounts to three-sevenths of the original amount asked for, less the four and a half million indebtedness incurred before December 1. Your committee attempted to investigate the various items under the six heads of submission brought before us.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did not quite catch the gentleman's last statement about the comparison of the amounts asked for now and those asked for in December.

Mr. LITTAUER. In December the amount asked for was $16,500,000. There was then actual indebtedness incurred of $4,000,000 general expense and $500,000 indebtedness to the Panama Railroad Company. Deducting that four and a half million dollars from the sixteen and a half millions dollars, we have $12,000,000 left. These $12,000,000 were designed to provide money for the conduct of the work for seven months. After providing $11,000,000 for existing indebtedness and for four of the seven months we have made provision for expenditures until the 1st of April, and the only good reason that I have been able to find out why we did not provide until the end of the fiscal year was that between now and the 1st of April determination should be reached whether the canal was to be a lock or a sea-level canal, and that conclusion would to a certain extent determine the amount of money necessary to be spent in the last three months of the fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And also the question as to whether it would be by contract or not.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and it is also worthy of consideration that we have no committee to examine into the matter at that time, and it was thought if the balance of the estimate was carried over a committee would investigate.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me the suggestion, although we had no committee at that time, it was considered necessary to have several days' debate in the House, and now they consider an hour and a half as a great allowance; so probably we shall not get near as much investigation of the subject as we did then.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is an unfortunate fact that at the time the bill was first introduced we did not have before us the Department's full estimate which was subsequently printed in the RECORD December 11, showing the exact categories of expenditure that was proposed to be made under the $16,500,000 appropriation.

Mr. MANN. We had it all the time from the time we began to consider it the first day.

Mr. LITTAUER. But it was printed in a segregated shape.

Mr. MANN. Now, I would like to have the gentleman give us information that has been acquired by the committee on this examination—that is, distinguished from the information that was before the House in December.

Mr. LITTAUER. I must be perfectly frank——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think the gentleman from Illinois will remember that many of the details the committee had in their possession had not been put in the RECORD at the time the debate commenced, and my recollection is that the gentleman inserted a number of details involved in the work at my request.

Mr. MANN. I inserted in the RECORD additional details in reference to past expenditures. I apprehend the gentlemen have before them precisely the same information in reference to this appropriation that was laid before the House on the first day of the session. I do not desire to criticise the committee; I think it did just what they ought to do.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think there is this distinction, when the matter was before the House at the beginning of the session there was no committee that could give the matter investigation and report to the House the facts as to what was necessary, or as to the future expenditure of the appropriation or how they had expended that which had previously been appropriated. In this instance the Commission submitted to the committee an estimate of the amount for the remainder of this fiscal year, or from April 1 to July 1, which is, in substance, what they submitted to the House at the beginning of this session. The Commission and the Secretary of War were very fully interrogated in respect to the details of the estimate submitted and as to their administration. No investigation preceded the request for the appropriation at the beginning of this session. That is the difference between the situation now and the situation at the beginning of the session.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must pardon me. I do not wish to criticise the Committee on Appropriations. I wish to defend the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who introduced the bill from the supposition that he introduced the bill without making some investigation, and I apprehend that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who introduced the bill last December gave fully as much attention to interrogating the Secretary of War and other gentlemen connected with the Isthmian Canal Commission as the Committee on Appropriations has now, in the short time they have had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. LITTAUER. That may be true, and I believe that it is true, and yet we have had through hearings, both before the Senate committee and before our own committee, some light thrown upon the problem.

Mr. MANN. I do not doubt that.

Mr. LITTAUER. The operations now under way down there are designed to make the Canal Zone ready for the work of excavation. First, to put it on a sanitary basis, so that men can live there in safety, and next to provide houses, dwelling houses and hospitals, and all things necessary for support when we get to the work of excavation; third, to build such necessary railroad facilities that the "spoil" can be disposed of when once excavated, and the latter is perhaps the most serious problem connected with the entire undertaking. To carry that out the Panama Railroad has to be double-tracked, about 200 miles of spurs constructed in order that when the day for excavation may come—and we are advised that that day will be reached during this fiscal year at some time between the 1st of April and the 1st of July—all preparations for going ahead with the work in a fair way may have been accomplished. Even during this time, during the time of preparation, the Commission will gather such information as would make it possible, if found wise, to give out contracts for various parts of this work. Until this preparatory work is over, until the Commission is thoroughly advised of what particular work must be done, consideration of whether or not it would be wise to do any of this work by contract can not be had, because, naturally, contractors going into the Tropics, surrounded by a lot of conditions that are not regular, will place a very high percentage in their bids to cover contingencies.

Now, to dwell for a moment upon the six items of appropriation submitted in this bill, which are really the same items we had previously before us. Then we had before us the estimates covering seven months, December 1 to June 30. Now we have three-sevenths of those estimates to consider and throughout the six items of appropriation. Three of these items cover expenditures in the United States. The purchase of material in the United States, for which $1,000,000 is asked, is the first item submitted. The conclusion of the delivery under contracts already entered into for equipment not provided for in the eleven millions appropriated, consisting of flat cars, locomotives, steam shovels, unloading machinery, water tanks, and dredges estimated on, that is provided for on the basis of three-sevenths of the total amount of the contracts. Next come the additional expense incident to the isthmian canal management here in the United States, consisting of salaries, expenses of the purchasing agents, and the like, on a basis of $25,000 per month.

Then there are the three classes of expenditure on the Isthmus. First, the transportation to the Isthmus of labor, the local transportation, hotel and hospital supplies, with some small amount of miscellaneous purchases made from stores at the Isthmus. Next the amount which will be due for the work now in process by the Panama Railroad Company under the agreement reached between the Commission and the Panama Railroad Company for the building of the extra amount of railroad construction required by the Commission. Third, to provide for the pay rolls. These pay rolls, again, are estimated on the amount expended during the month of October, 1905, plus an increase of 25 per cent on the gold roll, or the roll paid in gold of our standard, paid to higher-grade mechanics, engineers, and the like, together with an increase of 50 per cent on the silver roll, which covers the employment of ordinary colored labor.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Why do they pay two kinds of currency?

Mr. LITTAUER. For the simple reason that they wanted to pay the individuals who work on the Isthmus in the currency they were accustomed to when working at home. The colored laborers are drawn from Martinique, Barbados, and Jamaica, are accustomed to silver, and they understand that when they are receiving 20 cents an hour—and I will comment on the wages paid in a moment—it is on the basis of the same currency that they were ordinarily accustomed to at home. If we had offered 10 cents in gold they would not have appreciated it, and would have thought that their labor was being paid only one-half of what we actually were paying them; and in order to pay them in the currency they were accustomed to the Commission determined to have two rolls—one to cover the colored labor in silver and the other to pay mechanics and other assistants drawn largely from the United States—white men—in gold.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Was the silver in the denomination of the money generally used down in that section?

Mr. LITTAUER. Entirely so; but in particular an agreement was reached between the Republic of Panama and the United States in reference to currency.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was rendered necessary on account of the practical conditions existing there. They hired these people with currency with which they were familiar, and that is the foundation of all this hubbub about coin and currency down there.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know why any hubbub should arise.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. We have heard of it more or less in this body. That is the real reason it was used—it was necessary.

Mr. MANN. In other words, if they were paid in gold there they would have to exchange it for silver to make use of it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And hence the effort to provide the money which they were to use down there.

Mr. MANN. And prevent them from having to make exchange, and because they were used to it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So this arrangement was made to provide them with what they wanted and needed.

Mr. MANN. The circulation is in silver, and when we went down to the Isthmus a year ago the first thing to be done by our party was to exchange the American notes for silver. You buy everything in silver, you pay for everything in silver; they do not handle gold coin or American currency.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is local silver currency.

Mr. MANN. Local silver; yes.

Mr. MACON. In reference to what the gentleman from Maine has just said, I desire to state that the gentleman who is in charge of the bill answered his question very properly when he stated that silver was for the colored labor. If the gentleman from Maine is not aware of the fact, I desire to state that the negroes are very partial to silver.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I so understand it.

Mr. LITTAUER. The fullest examination that your committee were able to give to the estimates submitted to us led us promptly to the conclusion that the month of October, taken as a basis for these estimates, was the fairest estimate possible for anyone to make within reason at this time, and would cover the necessities during the present fiscal year. When we came to that conclusion we were led on through the items to the amount needed for pay rolls to an examination into the character of the labor and method of supplying labor for this work and its efficiency, and after a very full investigation your committee came to the conclusion, as advised by the Secretary of War, the president of the Commission, and the chief engineer, that it was proper to offer here an amendment embodied in the paragraph repealing the eight-hour provision controlling the work under the general law.

It is easily realized that labor had to be paid on the Isthmus more than it was accustomed to receive at home as an inducement to go to the Isthmus. I am now going to refer mainly first to the silver roll, or common colored labor roll. The rate of wages was originally settled on the 27th of August, 1904, for common laborers at 15 cents, and for those who had shown greater ability at 17½ cents silver per hour. By action of the executive committee at Panama, on May 31, 1905, this rate was raised to 20 cents for the ordinary laborer and 26 cents for those who had shown greater ability, which is the present rate of wages. Consequently the colored laborer at work there to-day receives from $1.60 to $2.08 per day of eight hours. It has been clearly proved that this rate of wages is abundantly high to attract labor to the Isthmus. The general character of the labor is such as can be found in the Tropics in adjacent countries. It is labor of a very indolent class, labor that will only continue at work as long as necessity requires, and it has been found on the Isthmus, where these rates of wages are being paid, that a large share of the labor will work only two or three days at a time, until sufficient money has been accumulated to enable the laborers to lie around for the rest of the week. Many of them accumulated so much during last season that some 2,000 Jamaicans went home to pass the Christmas holidays, and many of those, hundreds of them in fact, are now hastening back. It was clearly proved that the wages paid were higher than these men had been accustomed to receive.

Now, one of the main questions in connection with the construction of this canal will be, How can we get sufficiently efficient labor to perform this work? Experiments have been made with gangs of 1,000 men to determine how the efficiency of the work there compared with the effectiveness of ordinary labor here in the United States, and the president of the Commission informs us that its relative efficiency is only from 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent compared with common labor here at home. Consequently, measured from the standpoint of efficiency, the rate of wages per day should be multiplied by three, at least, and probably by four, so that in cost to the United States it would be about the same as though common labor were paid here at home at the rate of $4.80 a day in silver.

It has been very difficult, as I stated a few moments ago, to keep these men at work. They go to work in the morning but soon disappear in the jungle, willing to abandon work under the slightest pretext. Therefore, the rate is paid per hour. The chief engineer said that after much consideration he had reached the conclusion that if he could work his men ten hours a day he would save the United States, in the expense for this common labor, at least 20 per cent each year, and that that sum would aggregate many millions. The climate is such that at the rate at which they work, any man can work ten hours a day and remain in good health.

Mr. TAWNEY. They work from daylight until dark.

Mr. LITTAUER. They work from sunrise to sunset at home, and for, probably, not more than one-half or two-thirds of the amount they are receiving on the Isthmus. Moreover, the general conditions for taking care of this vast body of men would be greatly improved if the hours of work could be lengthened. They would be healthier. They would sleep better. They would not acquire indolent habits so easily.

Mr. MANN. What has the Commission to say in reference to the time for constructing this canal? Is it possible with eight-hour labor to maintain two shifts?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, the Commission informed us that they hope at some subsequent day, when the conditions of preparation are over, to at least work two shifts.

Mr. MANN. But it is not possible at present?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not possible at present.

Mr. MANN. So that if the hours of labor are shortened 20 per cent——

Mr. LITTAUER. The hours of labor ought to be lengthened instead of shortened.

Mr. MANN. If the hours of labor were shortened 20 per cent, as they are now, to what they were before, it means 20 per cent increase in the length of time necessary for the construction of the canal?

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not exactly follow the gentleman on that. Twenty per cent more laborers may be needed to construct the canal, or 20 per cent more time devoted to work.

Mr. MANN. I say it will take 20 per cent greater length of time to construct the canal working with eight-hour labor than it will with ten-hour labor?

Mr. KEIFER. With the same number of men.

Mr. MANN. It must be supposed we have at work there eventually all the men who can be employed at any one time.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is the intention, of course, that this work shall progress just as fast as it can, and the Commission looks forward to having an appropriation to permit it to go ahead with the work as it can be readily handled, and certainly it is the intention of Congress so to provide.

Now, as to the gold roll and the bearing of the eight-hour law on the mechanics, the engineers, and others on that roll who either to-day or in the future will handle the big steam shovels or act as engineers, or in some other capacity, on the railroad or in the machine shops, and who goes down to the Isthmus in order to better his condition, in order to secure higher rates of wages than are prevalent for a similar character of work at home. When he gets there he finds that his ability to earn is curtailed by the eight-hour law; he clamors for the opportunity to work more hours in order to earn more wages, and consequently the Commissioners are importuned, day after day, by the largest proportion of these men to permit them to work overtime. They are working in the Tropics; their field of diversion is naturally very much restricted, with no opportunity for outdoor exercise. The Commission is positive that these men can work longer without detriment to their health, and that they can perform, by working longer hours, the proper proportion of work; that it would make them more contented, and that it would be easier to get better men, for the conditions of employment in the United States now make it difficult to secure first-class mechanics to do this work under the eight-hour restriction there. We believed it was good policy, both for the interests of these mechanics and for the Government, that the eight-hour law be repealed, especially so far as it has to do with this gold roll of labor, and particularly because of those included on the gold roll, over 80 per cent of whom perform clerical labor and are, in consequence, exempted from its provisions.

Mr. MANN. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to call his attention to paragraph 15, line 12, for salaries, etc. I hope that the gentleman will not think I have any idea at all of criticising the committee in bringing this bill in the shape it is in. I want to obtain some informaton for the next bill that is coming in. The law that passed in December provides that the President shall annually cause to be made by the persons appointed or employed by him in governing said Canal Zone and the construction of said canal estimates of expenditures and appropriations in detail, so far as practicable, which estimate shall cover all annual salaries paid to persons employed on said work, etc. It was stated in another body, located at no great distance from this, while this bill was under consideration, that the estimates would be prepared in time for this deficiency bill. The gentleman is not responsible for that statement?

Mr. LITTAUER. No.

Mr. MANN. And I beg to ask him whether such an estimate has been presented?

Mr. LITTAUER. Such an estimate has not been presented, but discussions with reference thereto were had. The provision of law requires plainly that the schedule of wages or salaries should be included in the expenditures for the next fiscal year. Consequently your committee did not feel warranted at this time to go into a determination of just what salaries it would recommend. The legislative bill will, at an early day, be before the committee for preparation, or the sundry civil bill, if this subject belongs therein, and then this mandate will, of course, be carried out. The list of salaries was published, I believe, by the gentleman asking this question when the first debate was on. If there is to be an investigation in connection with the amount paid for salaries, that can all be made through that committee, with a view of determining the salaries, but for the three months of the present fiscal year, for which this bill provides, your committee felt that it would not be well to enter upon that broad subject.

Mr. MANN. As I said before, I have no criticism of the committee in reference to it; but I would like to ascertain, if possible, what is to be the policy of the committee. The distinguished chairman of the committee I suppose will be at the head of the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill, and I should like him to state if it will be the policy of the committee to appropriate specifically for the salaries of this Commission and the employees of the Commission. If the gentleman is willing to yield to his colleague long enough to permit him to make a declaration on that point I am sure it would be of very great value to the House.

Mr. LITTAUER. This mandate applies to the next fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. The law requires an estimate shall be made for the next fiscal year. What I desire to know is whether it will be the policy to bring in a bill appropriating specifically or if it will be as is done with the Revenue-Cutter Service, for instance, where an appropriation of so many dollars in a lump sum is made rather than appropriations specifically?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, speaking for myself as chairman of the committee, we shall endeavor to follow the practice, the long-established practice of the House, following the law which applies alike to all the Departments, which requires them to submit their estimates to Congress. They are referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations has heretofore included in the legislative bill specifically the salaries for all the officers that have been authorized by law. I know of no reason why that practice will not follow or obtain when we come to legislate with respect to the salaries for officers in the employ of this Commission.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I simply wish to say this: In my own judgment the Isthmian Canal Commission ought to be abolished; the work ought to be put under the control of the President; then the power of Congress to watch the work ought to be maintained through the appropriation bill, and in such way prevent extravagance by making specific appropriations for salaries and as specific as possible for other items of public work. Unless the appropriation is made specifically for the salaries there is no way of preventing extravagance, and it is not possible practically by law outside of an appropriation bill to provide what the salary shall be for a place, because the place may be in existence this year and not be in existence next year.

Mr. TAWNEY. So far as the abolition of the Commission is concerned, I think the gentleman from Illinois will admit that that does not come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. Whatever appropriations are made will have to be made in accordance with existing law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. And if it is for the best interest to abolish the Commission the committee of which the distinguished gentleman is a member has jurisdiction of that and of the whole subject and can act on it.

Mr. MANN. We have a bill before us on that subject now; but it might make a great deal of difference as to what should be put into that bill, as to whether we should endeavor by law to create certain places and fix salaries in that bill, or whether we should leave that to the Committee on Appropriations, where, in my judgment, it belongs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that the Committee on Appropriations has no power to fix the places.

Mr. MANN. That is the very point I am trying to draw out. "The gentleman" believes that the Committee on Appropriations has the power to make a specific appropriation for a certain place which is authorized by law. We authorize the President to employ a man and fix his salary until Congress acts; but the Committee on Appropriations in its bill can say what salary shall be paid to that man by fixing a salary for the place, and that is the only protection Congress has from extravagance in the construction of the canal, except the protection of the President himself, who will undoubtedly do all that human nature can do.

Mr. HOGG. Under this ten-hour provision is it the purpose of the Government to increase the pay of the laborers there?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not. The Chief Engineer of the Commission believes that they can secure as efficient labor at the rates now being paid and that the labor will be willing to accept such compensation for ten hours' work. They are paid by the hour. A workman can work six hours, if he desires to, and if it is his usual custom to work longer than that he can do so.

Mr. HOGG. Then under the ten-hour arrangement they would get more pay?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is contemplated, I believe, to reduce the rate per hour. The laborer would get more pay actually.

Mr. HOGG. It is admitted that it is not a healthy place to work.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, it is being put in a condition that we are advised will make it quite as healthy a place for labor as many situations in the United States.

Mr. HOGG. And you say that the longer they work the healthier they will be?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I do not claim that.

Mr. HOGG. That they will sleep better?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; I claim that if they work ten hours the less trouble they will get into and have less opportunity for indolence.

Mr. HOGG. On that theory you ought to work them twenty hours a day, and then they would not have any time to get into any devilment at all.

Mr. LITTAUER. Ten hours would result in the betterment of their condition and would be a saving to the Government of at least 20 per cent.

Mr. HOGG. I should like to make a point of order on page 16——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has not yet reached page 16.

Mr. LITTAUER. The committee has not reached page 16. This is general debate.

I trust that no attempt will be made to apply American standards either to the rate of pay or the amount of work accomplished by labor in the Canal Zone. The reasons for the eight-hour law in the United States are the maintenance of the standard of living of the working people in this country, and these would not in any way apply to the alien colored labor drawn from the Tropics at work in the Canal Zone.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. There might, perhaps, be no objection, if I may be pardoned, with great respect to the committee, or, I will say, there would be much less likely to be objection, if the statements of the gentleman as understood by myself, and I suspect as understood by the House, on behalf of the committee, were consistent. A little while ago, in the gentleman's discourse, the strongest argument in favor of this amendment was that the men were sent down from the north, skilled laborers, and that they worked by the hour; that they were importuning the authorities to be allowed to work overtime and for the opportunity to make more money. Then when the question is raised on the point of the probable cost the gentleman meets that by the proposition that it is contemplated to reduce the wages per hour.

Mr. LITTAUER. I was not careful in my statement, sir. I was referring to the colored common labor, and not to skilled mechanics. A larger number of skilled mechanics is necessary for the proper prosecution of this work. It is difficult to obtain their services. We can only get them to go to the Isthmus by the inducement of higher wages, and we want to give them the opportunity to earn every dollar that the work will permit them to earn, and that they are capable of earning, and at the same time retain their good health and general condition.

Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time and ask the gentleman from Georgia to occupy a part of his time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss all the provisions in reference to the isthmian canal appropriation, but I see that the committee, in an unusual way, is attempting to pass an amendment to the eight-hour law of the United States. They provide in this bill as follows:

> The provisions of the act entitled "An act relating to the limitations of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia," approved August 1, 1892, shall not apply in the construction of the isthmian canal within the Canal Zone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this: We are not making laws in relation to eight hours' labor for other people. In this isthmian canal work, like all other work that is engaged in by the Government of the United States, we stand as the employer, and we are not making a contract with reference to the hours of labor; we make an agreement with the laborer as to how many hours he shall work in the United States. Now, we have fixed the American standard.

Mr. LITTAUER. The Commissioner stated to us that 80 per cent of the men arriving never heard of the eight-hour law until they got there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will put in the RECORD what the Commission said. I am not in favor of letting a lot of men on the isthmian canal state what shall be standard in America. [Applause.] The Congress of the United States has fixed the standard of American labor for the people that were employed. Now, if there are a lot of people on the isthmian canal who would like another standard that is not our affair, but it is our affair to treat the American workman to-day as we have agreed to, as you have agreed to do, and as your great party agreed to do in the last election. There is not a man on that side of the floor of the House but knows that the Republican headquarters in the last campaign sent out carloads of literature saying that Mr. Roosevelt, the head of your Administration, was in favor of maintaining the eight-hour standard of labor; and now I want the country to see what the head of your work, the man appointed by your Administration, says in reference to maintaining the American standard of labor, when you are confronted with the proposition of the isthmian canal, where you expect to hire more labor than anywhere else under the flag of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read a portion of the hearings on this question that I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know as to the printed instructions; they have their instructions. Common labor is 20 cents an hour silver. After a man has demonstrated his efficiency so as to be worth more than that, and as was undoubtedly done originally to spur a man to do better work, in case he is needed for that work, then he is given 26 cents, but never higher than that price.

Mr. GRAFF. How many hours do they work?

Mr. STEVENS. Eight hours are all we are allowed to work.

Mr. GRAFF. What time do they commence in the morning?

Mr. STEVENS. They work from 7 until 11 and then from 1 until 5.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Would they not like to work more than eight hours if they had an opportunity?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know. I think it is fair to say that they do not like to work at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. Could you work them more than eight hours if you were allowed to by law?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. And you could work them to better advantage if they worked more hours?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. Suppose the eight-hour law was abrogated, would you work this colored help more than eight hours?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; and I would not pay them so much per hour.

Mr. GRAFF. What number of hours are they accustomed to work?

Mr. STEVENS. I can not tell you. On the plantations in Jamaica a great many of them, I think, work practically from daylight to dark.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LITTAUER. Would you recommend the abrogation of the eight-hour law, so far as it refers to the canal operations?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. And you believe that you could get more work for the same amount of money?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; undoubtedly; 20 per cent at least. You asked about their coming back. I want to state that I am aware of these criticisms and insinuations, particularly about Jamaica. I have the reports of the Isthmus as to the people returning of their own volition from Jamaica and they show that upward of 500 came back since January 1 and that they are seeking work. You understand that Jamaica is an English colony and they observe the holidays, and these men bring back the report that there is a number coming after them. I have not a man in Jamaica and I have not hired a man in Jamaica for five months.

You asked me about the eight-hour law. One source of irritation with the American labor on the Isthmus is because they can not work overtime. They say we have come down away from our homes and we want to earn money, and they have deluged us with requests and petitions to be allowed to work overtime more than the eight hours. Of course my hands are tied and I can not allow it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of this bill contends that the workmen on the Isthmus—the American workmen—want the eight-hour law repealed. I grant you that what Mr. Stevens, the chief engineer, says bears him out in that respect. Isn't that an absurd proposition? What does Mr. Stevens say? He says he wants the eight-hour law repealed, not to allow them to work ten hours and get ten hours' pay, but he says distinctly that he wants it repealed so that he can make them work longer for the same amount of pay. Now, do you think any man on the Isthmus, American or not American, is petitioning the Congress of the United States to have his time extended so that he can work longer for the same amount of money?

Mr. LITTAUER. If the gentleman will permit me, his inference is wrong from the statement he has already made. The engineer is referring there very plainly to the colored roll and not to the gold roll—not to the roll that covers the pay of mechanics.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have read it, and the gentleman from New York is assuming that he is referring to the one roll and not the other. The gentleman does not say that he wants the pay for the gold roll for ten hours and the other roll for eight hours.

Mr. LITTAUER. The engineer says, "One source of irritation to the American laborer on the Isthmus is because they can not work overtime." Now, the American laborer is the laborer on the gold roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York is taking up my time from that assertion. I have had it read from the desk. He also says that he proposes to have this change made so that he can save 20 per cent, and when he says that he will save 20 per cent he doesn't say he is going to save it out of the silver roll.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman permit me to take up another minute of his time. Mr. Shonts says: "Ten hours a day for common labor would make them healthy; they would have less time for devilment; they would sleep better; and when we consider the small number who would receive any benefit at all on the one hand and the 20 per cent increase in the cost on the other, the millions of dollars it means and the labor demand at home, it does seem to me a very funny business to continue the eight-hour law." Mr. Shonts there refers specifically to common labor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all; he is referring to the common laborer at that particular point——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish my sentence—but he does not refer to anybody when he says that he expects to have them work ten hours with eight hours' pay.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many common laborers are now employed down there by the Commission?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, I do not know the number.

Mr. TAWNEY. Seventeen thousand; and of the remaining number of employees about 1,500 are clerks, to whom the eight-hour law does not apply. So there are only about 1,000 skilled laborers affected, and these want to work ten hours, but can't. The total number employed is 19,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not affect the argument in the case.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman was conveying the idea that we were employing all American labor on the Isthmus. I simply wanted to know whether he knew anything about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not attempting to do anything of the kind. I merely say this: That white or black, any kind of labor, the American people have fixed the standard of American labor at eight hours. The Congress of the United States has fixed that standard of labor, and if you take this step on the Isthmus you are starting to take a step backward all along the line, and you are going away and abandoning the principle that you have agreed not only here in Congress, but on every stump in this land to maintain, and that not later than your last campaign.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman believe that we could secure these mechanics to work there at 20 per cent less rate than they are now receiving?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not think that has anything to do with it. I am not here advocating cheap labor. I have never advocated cheap labor. I do not believe in cheap labor. I do not believe in cheap labor that the Republican party is allowing to pour into the port of New York and other places from Europe every day, and I have tried ever since I have been here to pass a law to stop that cheap labor coming into this country. I do not believe in cheap labor on the Isthmus; I do not believe in it here. I believe in maintaining the American standard wherever the American flag floats.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman believes in the American standard of common labor, to be maintained at the Isthmus, and a force secured adequate to conduct this work of excavating the canal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You may not get as good labor at the Isthmus as you can at home, but that does not prevent you from maintaining the American standards in carrying out your work, and I say that we are committed to those standards, and the Appropriations Committee has no right in this way to attempt to repeal the statute law that the people of the United States have put on the statute books; and I want to say that if no one else raises the point of order, I ask the Chair now when the point is reached to recognize me that I may make the point of order against this proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HOGG] has preempted that right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time, or so much as is necessary, to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have no idea of occupying the time of the House for thirty minutes. I do desire, however, for five or six minutes to address myself to this proposition. It seems to me that the gentleman in charge of this bill has made a mistake in his estimate of what an estimate is. Some time ago we were faced with an emergency bill to provide sixteen and one-half millions of dollars for the prosecution of the work on the Panama Canal. The House then expressed to the Panama Commission and to the country its desire that hereafter appropriations for the construction of the Panama Canal should take the usual course. If there were any necessity for appropriating the amount of this bill, that necessity could have been met by introducing into this House a bill duly reported from a committee, duly passed upon in a regular way, or else by a provision on a regular appropriation bill.

It seems to me that the most hopeless thing about us individually and collectively in attending to our duties in Washington as a legislative body is the contemplation of the impotency of the legislative branch of the Federal Government in connection with all sorts of matters. We are led around by the nose—with rings in our noses—by chiefs of bureaus, chiefs of divisions, and heads of departments, and whenever we give notice to the country, after voting down a part of an appropriation in an emergency bill, that we would demand the regular order, gentlemen come in later on, out of the regular order once more, this time in the phase of a deficiency bill, asking that what the House refused to do irregularly shall still be done irregularly. Now, the gentleman speaks about the estimates having been given to the committee, to the House, and to the country. No estimate, in the true sense of the word, has been given at all. In the regular routine of business an estimate means much more than what this committee brings to this House now. An estimate comes from the Department. It comes printed. It comes long in advance. It comes in time to be ready for the study and consideration of each Member of this House and for the study and consideration of the country, in order that the country may influence this House.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment. And the only thing which comes before us here now are a lot of detailed statements furnished to this committee, never furnished to this House in any proper manner, no hearings that could be followed by the country, no opportunity for the country outside of this House to consider the question before them and to influence the House. This is a popular government, or it is supposed to be. It is a government of the people, through their representatives, and not a government of committees, not a government of representatives merely, but a government of the people by the people, through their representatives and through their committees. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does not the gentleman know that regular estimates, as full as estimates usually submitted to the House, have been forwarded by the Secretary of War, through the Secretary of the Treasury, and they are before the committee and before the House—a regular document of estimates?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that the hearings were held in the usual way and that the published hearings are now to be had by anyone who asks for them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; "now to be had," but not to be had a sufficient length of time before this question was brought to the consideration of the House for the country to determine for itself the wisdom or unwisdom of this policy. I know a so-called "detailed statement" was submitted to this committee, and I do know that this committee attempted to make a detailed appropriation to this House. Let us see how detailed and how specific that appropriation is. Let me read it, Mr. Chairman: "For miscellaneous material purchased in the United States, $1,000,000." How miscellaneous? What material? What purchases? "For miscellaneous purchases on the Isthmus, $400,000." That might be held to be comparatively specific except for the language put in there later, "and miscellaneous expenditures." That will be the language of the law when it goes out. Will you tell me what possible devotion of money to any possible purpose is not covered by the language "and miscellaneous expenditures?"

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman not think that this appropriation is in line with every other item of an appropriation bill covering miscellaneous expenditures? The estimate for these miscellaneous expenditures is given in full detail in the estimate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no estimate; there is a statement to a committee of this House.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, it is an estimate forwarded to the House from the Secretary of the Treasury in the usual way, and that estimate covers such items as labor, equipment, lead pipe, iron pipe, vitrified sewer pipe, lumber, cement, forage of animals, and so on.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have read all that.

Mr. LITTAUER. And if we were to attempt to legislate on each one of those items do you think it would be for the best purposes? We give the sums gathered together under the proper heads of the various items.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to a question, but not for a speech, which my friend so delightfully makes to the House, not that I do not care to hear it, because it always pleases me to the utmost, but because, actuated by the ordinary Congressional weakness of preferring to hear my own speech rather than the other fellow, I really must cut the gentleman's time off or add to my own. "For amount to pay the Panama Railroad Company for material and services"—that is the next item I find here—"$200,000." Who owns the canal? The United States. Who owns the railroad? The United States.

And yet here is an "estimate," as it is called, of something for the United States to take out of one pocket and pay back into another pocket of the United States. "For Isthmus pay rolls, $2,100,000." Now, I am glad to see that; I mark that with my approval, because that is the only part of this appropriation that is devoted to digging, if, indeed, it is. Now, when you go to build a canal I like the digging part of the work. I find that $2,100,000 of this appropriation is appropriated to dig and the balance is appropriated for something else. Let us follow this up. Now, "For new equipment purchases, $1,565,786," in all, $5,340,786, "which shall continue available until expended." Yes; continue in itself available plus another deficiency, I expect. You have been engaged here two or three days trying to limit the Executive Departments from overriding the will of Congress with regard to expenditures by coolly making deficiencies out of things they have asked for and you refused to give them. You are trying to limit and restrict that, but the one thing you seem not to want to limit and restrict is this Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman knows as well as every other Member of this House that the same limitations that apply to the Executive Departments in respect to the expenditure of appropriations made will apply to the Isthmian Canal Commission or to the President of the United States, under whose general jurisdiction the expenditure is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it would do it but for this bill. The Isthmian Canal Commission—and the gentleman from Minnesota knows it; he talks about what I know——

Mr. TAWNEY. Knows what?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Violated your own law about existing appropriations, and instead of holding them accountable for the law you are giving them what they demand.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Isthmian Canal Commission violated the law?

Mr. WILIAMS. Undoubtedly, in creating this very deficiency.

Mr. TAWNEY. They have created no deficiency.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then what have you got five millions and a half of dollars for them in a deficiency bill for?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no money that is available for the doing of the work of the Commission after April 1, and there never has been except up to the 1st of April.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this a deficiency appropriation or not?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then what is this doing in a deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is for the same reason that there is in the neighborhood of $7,000,000 in addition to this carried in this bill as emergency appropriations, not as deficiencies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Chairman, if this is not a deficiency, it ought not to be on this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that reenforces what I said a moment ago, that this appropriation ought to have been brought into this House by a separate bill, with opportunity for this House to consider it at length, and not upon this particular bill, or else it ought to have been brought in on an appropriation bill later on. Now, a few words——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not a deficiency in the sense that Congress has heretofore appropriated less money for the service during this fiscal year than was expended. It is a deficiency in the sense that the Congress has not appropriated at all, and it is anticipated that they will require this additional appropriation before the expiration of this fiscal year. There is no deficiency to-day in the amount already appropriated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is not? Then why this item?

Mr. TAWNEY. This carries it from the 1st of April until the 1st of July. This is to provide for the expenses incident to the work on the Isthmus or in the Canal Zone during that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, having heard that explanation, and leaving it to the common sense of the country and the House to determine whether it explains or not, I shall proceed with a discussion of this matter.

Mr. Chairman, we are about to construct—and "about" is a very accurate word in this connection, because it is the most indefinite and vague word I know of, and, in connection with the Administration's management of the isthmian canal matter, in order to be accurate we have to use indefinite terms—we are "about" to construct the isthmian canal, and yet nobody knows whether it is to be a sea-level or lock canal. Nobody knows whether the Government is to build it or whether contractors are to build it. Nobody knows anything about it, except that sixteen and one-half millions of dollars have gone the way of all the other money that went just before it. Nobody knows anything about it, except that it begins to smell a good deal like the old French isthmian canal in its day and time before its rottenness was thoroughly disclosed.

Now, there is a common-sense way of building that canal. The American people want it. The section for which in part I stand wants it especially. This side of this Chamber, if it were allowable to mention it in connection with a great national project like this, wants it especially. But what we want is the canal. We are not dead in love with the expenditures for the canal; we are not dead in love with the people who are running the Canal Commission; we are not dead in love with anything except digging the ditch. We want the ditch dug. We people on this side of the Chamber want it dug because it will decrease the amount of money necessary in order for the United States to engage in commerce with other nations. What you gentlemen on that side of the Chamber want to do, God only knows [laughter], because as a rule you preach the doctrine that the more expensive it is to trade with other nations the greater blessings we of the United States have in the way of full possession. [Applause.] We want it. Now, there is a common-sense way of digging it. If any business man who was not a ditcher, not an engineer, had to dig a canal, he would go out and employ somebody who was a ditcher and somebody else who was an engineer to dig his ditch. We have undertaken to let a lot of politicians and a lot of officeholders dig this ditch. They do not know anything about digging a ditch and never will know anything about digging a ditch.

Mr. LITTAUER rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do not interrupt me right here. We have reached the ditch and the question of digging the ditch itself. There is a common-sense way of digging that ditch, and digging it within five years; possibly three years. And if any of you, as a business matter, were charged with the responsibility of digging it, you would dig it that way. What is it? You would take that cut from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Ocean and divide it up into separate cuts. You would give a man as much as 3 miles down in the swamp and upon the level, but when you got to Culebra cut you would not give him more than a quarter or half a mile, and you would give out the work to the cheapest contractor that would give bond to do the work within three or five years. Strange as it may seem to you, a business man with the money behind him that the United States Government has would have the canal in operation within five years.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman open to such an engagement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the use of Congress coming here with this "for new equipment purchases," "for miscellaneous material purchases," "for Isthmian pay roll," so much money, and so much more, when any one of you knows that it will all be useless; you are going to give it out by contract. Gentlemen say that there will not be as good sanitary conditions along the canal under a contractor as under Government control. That I admit. That is true. A very much larger percentage of mortality would appear. They say it would cost more money. That is true, within a given length of time, but when you compare the percentage of mortality and the percentage of expenditure that would take place on the basis of the short time of three or five years with the aggregate mortality and expenditure that would take place upon the basis of the long time of twenty or twenty-five years, the scales weigh down in favor of the short term. There will be less in the aggregate of deaths, less in the aggregate of dollars expended, if you give the job out in the common-sense way to contractors.

There is another thing, Mr. Chairman; if you undertake to give the entire canal to one contractor you will find only about three concerns in the world that can bid. If you undertake to divide out the line of canal into cuts of 2 or 3 miles between level places, or half a mile, or a quarter of a mile in another and more difficult place, on the line run out by the United States engineers, so that each man will have his work laid out in front of him, each will go on with his own work, and each part of the work will lap with another part of the work. You can then find all over the United States not three but thousands of men who can undertake to bid for that work, because even if a man loses upon his contract it is not such an immense contract that it will bankrupt him; whereas if a man loses on a contract for the whole job he would be utterly bankrupt, and we will have bill after bill brought into the House to release him from a part of his obligation upon the contract he has undertaken.

Now, I want to say, in the interest of that part of the American people who want the canal dug, that want ships to go through it, that want freer commercial relations with the balance of the world, made freer by cheaper freight rates, made freer by easy transit from one great ocean to another, that it is about time that we were determining—not leaving to the President to determine, not leaving to the Commission to determine—but determining for ourselves how we are going to dig the canal. My own opinion is——

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, always; but let me finish that sentence. My own opinion is that the War Department ought to subdivide this work, so as to put it within the reach of ordinary contractors—not necessarily people worth a hundred million dollars—so that one man could bid for 2 miles down in the plain, another for a quarter or half a mile up in the mountains, or in the Culebra cut; block out the work for them and let them go to work, and do dirt slinging instead of all this miserable Washington red tape that seems to be all we are doing now, and which seems to lead to nothing but political mud slinging.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to enforce what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has said. I had not expected to say anything on the subject, and I have made no preparation, but I am a bit stirred up. The evil lies back of what is suggested in the gentleman's remarks, and it is that they have as yet no design for that canal. I am speaking now as an engineer. If you have a piece of work to be done, you first begin with the design. At the present time the only gentleman who, I think, has had any experience in canal work on that Commission is Mr. Harrod, from the gentleman's section, whom I happen to know personally.

Mr. WILLIAMS. An old member of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Yes; that is the man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Down in the old levee district of the Mississippi.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. But what they want first is a Commission of expert canal men who shall make a design for that canal. I think the Government should control the sanitation of the Isthmus, and I believe it has been very well done so far as I have been able to find out, but the canal should not be dug directly by the United States Government. The work should be broken up into sections, and given to the lowest bidders under competitive bids, and under proper bond, and the chief engineer should simply carry out the ideas of this canal Commission of experts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is right.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. If you have trouble with your eyes you do not go to a chiropodist, but you go to an oculist, and that is what I have been trying to urge on the Secretary for some time—that he get a commission of canal experts. I was at a meeting of civil engineers last week in New York City, and I sent in the names of twenty experts, some of whom I do not know personally, but whom I know about, and I told the Secretary of State he could submit those names to any engineers of standing in the United States and they would tell him each one of those men was an expert on his subject. One of them had charge of the Sault Ste. Marie locks. One of them was Mr. Noble, who knows more about it than any other man in the country. Another was Mr. Stearns, who constructed the dam for the Boston waterworks, and there were at least fifteen or twenty more of them of the highest standing. That is the way the canal ought to be dug, and it would be dug well and dug soon. [Applause.]

One of the difficulties of the De Lesseps Panama Canal was the lack of a continuous design; and I was informed by a division engineer on that work that he was told to continue his work in a certain direction until he had different instructions; and he further stated that he did not think such a thing existed as a concerted design of the entire canal work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad that the gentleman from New Jersey interrupted me, because with expert information upon a question concerning which I have none, he has been able to express himself infinitely better than I could have expressed myself. In the light of what he has said, and in the light of this question as it stands before the country, what is the use of our expending $400,000 "for miscellaneous material purchases?" It may turn out afterwards, when we give the job away by contract, that we have got just that much dead machinery on our hands. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, if he would ever report a bill to buy dredge boats, and to buy dynamite, and to buy all sorts of machinery for work that he contemplated finally giving out by contract? Why not? Because when you do give it out by contract you have just got the plant on your hands. How are you going to dispose of it? Sell it for nothing—put it up and let it go at whatever it will bring? If that is a correct statement—and I believe it is right—what is the sense of purchasing new equipment?

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You can not correct me there, because there is nothing to correct.

Mr. LITTAUER. The statement you had just finished when I began to address you.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. LITTAUER. You said, "What is the use of laying out money for miscellaneous expenses?"

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that. I said "miscellaneous material purchases."

Mr. LITTAUER. "Miscellaneous material purchases." Do you not know that those purchases are to be made for the purpose of getting ready, for the purpose of preparing to do the work of excavation? If we can take the testimony of such men as Mr. James J. Hill, who surely has had experience in this line, he told me we would be fools to begin any sort of work down there for two years, until we had made the fullest preparation. We are now preparing railroad tracks and disposing of the dirt that will be excavated at the time, and one of the greatest problems in connection with all this work is where to put the matter that will be excavated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I do not see that the interruption of my genial friend from New York has illuminated the particular point I was addressing myself to. The point I was making was this: If we are going finally to give out this work by contract, we do not want to be purchasing material, we do not want to be purchasing new equipment called for in this item of $1,165,786—they have got it down to $6; they know exactly what it is going to cost, provided there isn't another deficiency, don't you understand—what is the use of our buying a great excavating plant unless we are going to do the excavating, if we are going to give the work out by contract—and before we have built the canal that is what we have got to do—because the Government can not dig the canal either economically or honestly.

Already these things have become a stench in the nostrils of the American people. It has already demonstrated itself as a failure, as far as the digging this canal is concerned. All sorts of malodorous things are coming up before the American Congress to be smelled at, and sniffed at and passed over. Why, Mr. Chairman, if I was disposed to be a partisan, a mere sewer pipe—I have received from the Isthmus myself enough charges of every description about graft and corruption and rottenness down there to make the whole thing suspected. I have brought none of it before the House of Representatives, because I do not know the reliability or the responsibility or the truthfulness of the people who have been corresponding with me. I never make myself the voice of any sort of information that reflects on the integrity of any man, or any set of men, until I know, or I think I know, beyond all peradventure of doubt that the statements are true.

But it is in the air—it is floating all around. Gentlemen all know that we have got to get rid of this thing as a Government venture. We want the Government itself to supervise; we want the Government to tell where it is to be dug; we want the Government to tell how it is to be dug; we want the Government to sit in supervision over the work as it is done, but why in the name of God and common sense do you want to spend this money for material and equipment when it may happen—whether it has happened or not—that in a few months you may give out the work by contract, and then you will have to trust to the tender mercies of the contractors to take off your hands the material and equipment you have purchased for doing the actual work which you will not continue to do, and which the contractors will continue to do?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, have I any time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask one minute and a half——

Mr. LITTAUER. I will yield that to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that the proviso on page 15, to raise the money by issuing bonds, meets with the objection that I made in the House the other day. I do not care to repeat all that, nor to reenforce it by further argument. I think when people have money in the Treasury or in the bank lying to their credit they ought not to borrow money. I do not think it is sound business sense.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I want to ask unanimous consent that I have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify the rule so that he may have five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I couple with that the request that the five minutes be not taken out of the time on the other side, but that the other side have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is to modify the rule so as to give five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri and twelve minutes to the other side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTAUER. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to speak now?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Any time.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe, although it may be erroneous, that a great public work can be done best by those who administer the Government. I really am of the opinion that probably this canal can be best and cheapest dug by the Government itself. I may be entirely wrong in it, I do not profess to know much about it, but it appears that way to me. Now, I can not very well understand how that Culebra cut can be let out to half a dozen or a dozen contractors. It is 5 or 6 miles long, several hundred feet wide, nearly all solid rock, and several hundred feet deep in places.

Just how the man at the middle of that cut, having a quarter of a mile or a half a mile, would progress on his own account is something that my knowledge of engineering has not yet brought to me. Then, it seems to me that the taking away of the dirt, the disposition of that which is taken out of the huge cut, is a matter that has to be done carefully and dealt with by wholesale. Not to go into the matter far, and no one could in five minutes, it appears to me that we ought hardly to rush off on the spur of the moment and commit ourselves to the proposition of doing this work by contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I can not yield just at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course the moving of the dirt is a collective affair. The Government owns the railroad. That is not part of the contractor's duty; they do not control that.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, I understand the proposition then is to contract in part and do part by Government—contract with somebody to dig and then the Government will haul away the dirt. That is an important modification, but leaves in my mind still some objections to the main plan. Now, there is danger always in carrying forward so great a work, as there is danger in a small work, of dishonesty and incompetency. According to my judgment there is in the management of this work at this time, in the person of the Secretary of War, a man of as great ability and as high character as ever by any plan at any time will be put in charge of it. There may be peculation and there may be graft and dishonesty and incompetency in carrying forward the work, but I believe that in that by Government operation we have as sure guaranties of good work well done, and done with regard to decency and economy and honesty, as we could have in some other way. Suppose you invite bids? How easy a thing it is for bidders to combine. Suppose you invite contracts. How simple a proposition for the would-be contractors to be really one and the same. Why, these matters of combination to crush out competition and rob the public as well as to rob individuals is not a new thing in these United States of America. It has been practiced and perfected, and certainly the system can be transferred to the Isthmus of Panama. Just what we ought to do, just how we ought to do it, just how far we ought to go, and how far we can go, are things I do not know, and I sometimes suspect that some others do not know either. It is a great, serious undertaking. It is an enormous undertaking in its magnitude, and enormous in its probable outcome. Just what is best to be done, just how it is best to be done, I think no one of us can say; but for my part I am not ready to commit myself, out of hand, at once, to any particular plan about it. Let us correct as far as we can abuses where they exist. Let us banish from our minds, if there has lodgment been made in our minds, wholesale suspicions and accusations. Let us find out who is at fault and correct the faults and punish the evil doers; but let us have some confidence in our countrymen. Let us have some confidence in those who conduct affairs, let us conclude that there is something of reason and something of judgment and something of capacity and something of honesty in systems which may be adopted, and not all in systems which we might suggest. It is going to take the best judgment, it is going to take the highest play of the best intellects of the people of this country, to manage well that great undertaking. Let us address ourselves to it, if we can, in such manner as to bring about the best results. Let us not prejudge too many things. Let us not take too much for granted, and let us not depart entirely from what seems to me to be a sound principle, that public work can very well be done, in a great many instances, by public agencies, under public control. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for twelve minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the country is committed to the expenditure of $135,000,000 on this proposition. We have engaged to construct the Panama Canal, a work which, when completed, will stand first in the history of the ages, not only as the greatest achievement of engineering skill, but also in its benefits to mankind in adding to the world's transportation facilities, placing at the service of the nations of the world an open door, available to all who care to use it, without prejudice, without discrimination, and upon equal terms. There is no question but that we will soon be able to know the character of the canal that is to be dug. The Secretary of War said but a day or two ago that he hoped to be able to report to this House what the character of the canal was to be within the next fifteen days; that in the meantime the work of actually excavating the canal was quite out of the question. The sanitary arrangements to be made on the Isthmus are of such a nature that it would be unwise for those in charge of this great project to undertake the work of excavation at this time. No one doubts but that we will complete this undertaking and that we will complete it in an honest and in an efficient manner. It is of the greatest importance to us, to the Government, that we accomplish this work honestly, economically, quickly, efficiently. We must continue to command the admiration and the respect of the American people. The proper accomplishment of the desired result is the only way in which that can be done. There is no doubt of the integrity of the men who are engaged in the management of this great enterprise. There is no smell, no rottenness, no indication of smell and no indication of rottenness anywhere in the management of this great work up to the present time. The progress we are making is being carefully watched by the people, it is true, by our own people and by the people of the whole civilized world.

We have spent thus far $71,000,000. Of this $40,000,000 were paid to the French company for the purchase of its rights and its property; $10,000,000 to the Republic of Panama, and $21,000,000 in preparatory work getting ready for the actual work of construction, and to-day we have under consideration a further appropriation of $5,340,000 with which to continue the work until the close of the present fiscal year. The expenditure of this money will, in a measure, be used for the completion of sanitary arrangements, which are essential to the health and lives of those who may be engaged later in the work of excavation. Much of that already expended has been spent in preparatory work of a sanitary nature; much more in the purchase of machinery and in the reconstruction of the Panama Railway and the construction of houses, 2,500 of which are now under way to afford needed facilities for the occupants thereof; the creation of a water supply and the construction and extension of a sewerage system, the filling of swamps, and an endless number of other important essential things which must be complete in all their details before the work of construction can begin, and in order that we may be furnished with more specific information about what this money has been expended for and is being expended for I will ask the Clerk to read from a speech, delivered by Secretary Taft on November 18, in St. Louis.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amount of timber actually ordered and needed for the repairing and construction of the houses is upward of 32,000,000 feet. The difficulty in promptly securing the shipping of this will suggest itself to those who know of the incidental delays in practical transportation, either from Oregon or the Atlantic coast to Panama. Until lately there has been much delay in persuading competent carpenters from the United States in sufficient numbers to come to the Isthmus. The towns of Panama and Colon, and the sixteen towns and villages lying between them along the line of the canal and the railroad, all must be furnished with water. Panama as a settlement is one of the oldest towns in America, and yet for about three hundred years during the dry season there has been no means of furnishing water to the Panamans except from cisterns, puddles, and receptacles for water, often covered with green scum and as productive of disease as is possible to imagine. The first thing that the first Commission did, and to them is the credit due, was to make arrangements for the construction of a water supply for Panama. Engineer Wallace and his assistants devised the plans, took a reservoir which has been partly constructed by the French some 11 miles from Panama, built the dam 20 feet higher, and ran the water pipes to Panama, and then laid the mains into Panama, so that on the 4th of July, 1905, the water cocks in the city of Panama were opened and the people were permitted to drink pure water. This reservoir furnishes water also to the towns between it and Panama on the Pacific side; but another reservoir for Culebra, another one for Empire, another one for Bas Obispo, and others for Colon are being constructed, together with water-pipe systems in all of them. Sewers are now being constructed in Panama, and about 50 per cent of them have been completed. In order to make Panama really healthful the Commission has decided it to be necessary to pave the streets, which for centuries have been dirty—muddy in rainy weather, dusty in dry weather, and full of disease in all weathers. The whole Isthmus strip from Panama to Colon when our Commission went there first was grown up with underbrush, with weeds, and with all that jungle that a tropical soil and weather unrestrained rejoice in. Now, from point to point, as the population increases, as the work is elaborated, the jungle is being cut down, the hills are being shaved, and under the tremendous work of the sanitary department pools are being drained, swamps relieved of water, and in every way the stagnant water surfaces and the propagating ground for the deadly mosquito are being reduced. When one thinks of a strip 47 miles long and half a mile wide in the center of the Tropics, with marshy swamps and water accumulating everywhere, the task of reducing the stagnant water surface so as to prevent the generation of mosquitoes seems impossible. But it must be and can be done.

The mosquito is the worst enemy in the propagation of disease in the West Indies and American Tropics that man has. One variety in the Isthmus carries the germ of the deadly yellow fever, and another variety carries the germ of malaria, while a third infects its victims with the loathsome disease of elephantiasis. Petroleum prevents the generation of mosquitoes. A yellow-fever mosquito lives only about ninety days.

The custom of the yellow-fever mosquito is not to depart far from the place of its birth. It is not ordinarily born in the open. Its fellow who carries the malaria germ is born in the stagnant pools that are found in the meadows and on the hills and in the valleys, but the yellow-fever mosquito is ordinarily to be found in the forgotten corners of the cellars and dark rooms of tropical houses, in neglected utensils, in cisterns, puddles of water within the back yards, or in the closets of the residents. While with petroleum and with drainage a large part of the surface which generates the malaria mosquito may be reduced, the yellow-fever mosquito must be attacked in houses by fumigation, either with sulphur or pyrethrum. At one time it was thought sufficient in the town of Panama when a victim of yellow fever was taken from a house to fumigate that house and the two houses next, because the habit of the mosquito indicated that it did not depart far from the place of its birth. It seems that the mosquito that acquires and communicates the yellow-fever virus is a female, and this only during her period of gestation. She dies at the end of ninety days, and it is not known that her descendants continue to carry the poison. These limitations are what prevent the spread of the disease.

When Judge Magoon arrived upon the Isthmus he found Doctor Gorgas battling manfully against the yellow fever, but the cases seemed to be increasing. Judge Magoon conceived the idea that the fumigation which had been confined to two or three houses might well be extended to all the houses in Panama, and at considerable expense, and after procuring a large amount of material, every house in Panama was fumigated once every two weeks. To secure increased vigilance and popular assistance he employed all the respectable Panaman physicians of Panama as inspectors of the districts of that city, at annual salaries of $1,200 a year. He also offered $50 reward for the discovery of any case of yellow fever not reported. By methods of this kind the native apathy, usually so great an obstacle to successful sanitation in Spanish countries, was neutralized.

The plan of fumigation is as follows: Strips of paper are placed across the windows, which ordinarily have no glass or any netting in them, and then either by the fumes of the sulphur or pyrethrum every nook and cranny of the house is visited. These gases are fatal or paralizing to the mosquito. After sufficient time has passed the house is opened, and then a corps of health employees are set to work cleaning the house and sweeping out the dead mosquitoes, which are found in great numbers upon the floors. The mosquitoes are burned to avoid further mischief. By these mehods, for which Doctor Gorgas and Governor Magoon are both to be credited with great praise, yellow fever has been reduced to a point where during the last month only three cases were reported, not one of these among canal employees, and all originating many miles from the canal line. The efforts to subdue the fever instead of being relaxed are being continued. Square miles of woven-wire netting with interstices so small as to prevent the entrance of mosquitoes are spread about the piazzas of the house of every American or foreigner who comes to live under the auspices of the Canal Commission in the Isthmus. The windows inside are also screened, and then mosquito bars on the beds are used as a third precaution.

Whenever a case of yellow fever is discovered, the patient is at once either removed to the hospital and put under a woven-wire screen or, if he prefers to remain at home, the woven-wire screen is put over him and an orderly placed in charge of him at his own residence. In this way he is prevented from furnishing a supply of the poison to the healthy mosquitoes who, in turn, by stinging, would bring it back to man. In other words, the plan is to kill all the mosquitoes, well or ill, keep them as much as possible from stinging man, and isolate every man with yellow fever, not from his fellows, but from mosquitoes. Of course there are in this district, especially in the old town of Panama and at some villages along the canal, old houses which must be burned completely to the ground because of the infection which it is impossible to destroy in them. The old buildings in Panama are persistent sources of the yellow-fever mosquito.

The Canal Commission has its offices in one of these great stucco structures, with thick walls, bad ventilation, and damp nooks and crannies. It has often been fumigated and cleansed in every way; but once in a while a new case of fever in one of the American employees is to be charged to the old building. I am glad to say that the general offices are soon to be moved to new buildings at Culebra and Emperador on the line of the canal.

Little by little, and facing discouragement after discouragement, the 2,000 employees of the sanitary department are winning in this fight against disease, upon which the whole success of the canal work depends. As Mr. Stevens said to me, when I crossed the Isthmus with him this month, "I take off my hat to the work which the sanitation department has done in this Canal Zone." In the month of August, out of a force of 13,000 men, the percentage of illness was less than 25 per thousand. In June the cases of yellow fever were 61 and 19 deaths, in July there were 36 cases and 13 deaths, in September there were 9 cases, and in October but 3. The percentage of deaths among all is about 33, and among Americans about 20.

The work of furnishing water, of installing sewers, and of building houses is not now in the sanitation department, but is under the engineering and construction department, but as soon as the work is completed it will be turned over to the sanitation department for maintenance. Good food is now furnished by a commissary at reasonable rates. The carrying of refrigerated fruits and foods and meats on refrigerator cars from Colon across the Isthmus has just been begun. There is an ice plant at La Boca, another one at Colon, and others along the way are to be constructed, so that ice—that most healthful form of liquid in the Tropics—will be at hand for all.

A hotel has been erected at Corozal, where the American employees of the Commission may live and run in to their business in Panama in a few minutes by railway. A hotel of 128 rooms is being constructed at Ancon, which is the Pacific terminus of the terminating township of the governmental isthmian strip. The French had an excellent hospital at Ancon. They had also a rather large hospital at Colon. It was necessary, however, in view of the decay and lack of repair in which these hospitals were found, to refit them entirely. And now we have a hospital at Ancon, one at Panama, a convalescent hospital at Taboga, an island some 10 miles off the coast in Panama Bay, where very healthful water, healthful bathing, and fine fruits can be had, so that in all the hospital accommodation has been increased from about 350 to upward of 1,000 beds.

American trained nurses may be had at any point on the Isthmus, and any employee or laborer and any member of his family will be taken care of at these hospitals. In addition to this, and to protect itself, the commission has taken over the general hospital of Panama and has accepted $80,000 Mexican, a fund which had been voted by Panama for its improvement, and is now completely rebuilding it. It has also taken care of the insane and lepers of Panama, charging a certain rate per day. It exercises by right of law and by agreement complete quarantine jurisdiction over Panama, Colon, and the isthmian canal strip, and this quarantine is a division of the sanitation bureau under Governor Magoon and Colonel Gorgas.

Not only has it been found possible to accomplish much by the draining of swamps by surface drainage, or turning of stagnant pools into running water, the cutting of gutters and the flushing from reservoirs, but the attention of the chief engineer has also been directed to filling up with the spoil from excavation made in construction swamps and lowlands which now generate disease. The evidences of successful war against malaria are not so easy to produce as those of the defeat of yellow fever. One reason is that malaria is so much harder to combat than is yellow fever.

To begin with, yellow fever finds its victims only among those who are not residents of the tropical coast towns, so at least the statistics seem to show. Europeans and Americans from the Temperate Zone and Colombians coming from the hills and mountains, and other workmen from the interior—especially the highlands—are all subjects of yellow fever, but generally the blacks from Jamaica and Trinidad, from the islands of the Caribbean Sea, and the Panamans themselves, are immune. The field for attack by yellow fever, therefore, is very much limited. Not so, however, with malaria. An examination for experimental purposes, and repeated at various times under the direction of Colonel Gorgas, shows that at least 70 per cent of people picked up at random in the Isthmus have the malarial microbe. I am glad to say that since our occupation the malaria has not generally taken on the malignant form of the days of the railroad and French canal construction, but is rather mild.

The great difficulty in preventing the transmission of malaria is that, with 60 or 70 per cent of the persons infected with malaria, it is impossible to prevent malaria mosquitoes from happening upon the source of malaria supply in the blood of 60 per cent of the inhabitants of the Isthmus. The cases of yellow fever, on the other hand, are comparatively so few that isolating them is a real measure of protection to all.

Nevertheless, by the reduction in the total number of mosquitoes, which, though an enormous task, is still capable of accomplishment, the spread of malaria may be largely checked. This is a work of constant attention, and which will last long after the construction of the canal, and will be constantly the task of all those responsible for the government of the strip. Of course, the less malaria, even of the mild character, the greater the efficiency of the laborer.

In recounting what is being done, I will refer next to the work of engineering and construction. Preliminary to the work of construction proper much of the time of the engineer and his assistants has been taken up in doing that work of construction necessary for the sanitation of the Isthmus, to wit, the houses, sewering of water, the food supply, the hospitals, and places of recreation, all necessary to keep a sound mind in a sound body of each workman, whether superintendent, clerk, or common laborer.

In regard to the pure work of construction. As already said, the New French Panama Canal Company had bought the Panama Railroad for its use in the construction of the canal. When the property of the French Canal Company was transferred, the railroad was, from the standpoint of modern railroads, most inadequately equipped. It had a single track from Colon to Panama, with some sidings, very insufficient yards at the termini, and a large number of thin, light rails, quite insufficient for the heavy traffic which was carried over it. The laying of the track with heavier rails had been projected by the company before the transfer, but only a few miles had been laid. The Commission, acquiring control of the railroad company, directed the purchase of rails so as to lay completely the whole line with the heavier rails, and now all but 9 miles of the road is so equipped. The roadbed is as fine as any roadbed in the United States, ballasted in gravel and rock, and seems to be completely free from any possibility of washouts, but with this exception every other feature of the road as to structure and equipment is subject to criticism, and must be changed before it can be an adequate instrument in the hands of the Commission for the purposes for which it was bought. The gauge of the railroad is 5 feet, while the standard gauge in the United States and elsewhere is 4 feet 8½ inches, a fact which reduces much the amount of equipment which could be bought ready-made, and greatly increases the cost and time of buying that which is necessary. The telegraph system and the telephone system along the road are now being completely reconstructed. The yards and wharves at each end of the road for the purpose of receiving freight from steamers were utterly inadequate, and are now being very much enlarged at La Boca and at Cristobal, and must be repaired at Colon.

I should say that Cristobal is the Colon end of the canal, a made harbor, reached by the railroad and entirely unprotected from the north winds which, when they blow with violence, require all steamers at Colon wharves to go to sea. It is quite evident, and the Commission has so decided, that in order to transport the commercial freight which the railroad is under charter obligation to carry, and at the same time to transport to the spoil banks the excavated rock and dirt, it will be necessary to double track the road nearly all the way from Colon to Panama. The exceptions are through narrow cuts or at the top of the grade over which the spoil from the excavation will not need to be carried. The recent work of construction under Wallace and Stevens has been the work of putting this road into proper condition, of making preparation to double track, and of laying at various and suitable intervals long tracks leading from the Culebra cut at various elevations to the points of the Panama Railroad to which the spoil may be hauled downhill from the point of excavation and thence carried to Miraflores on one side or to Colon on the other, to be dumped into swamps or else to be dumped into barges and carried out to sea and there disposed of. The amount of this track laying will reach 250 or 300 miles when completed, and it is one of the chief consumers of labor in the construction department at present. The work of excavation is comparatively easy, for with compressed-air drills and blasting and the twenty-nine modern steam shovels which are now on the ground, and the sixty more which are ordered, digging might go on rapidly. With a sea-level canal at least 270,000,000 cubic yards of material will have to be blasted, dug out, and carried from a few feet to 15 miles.

The great problem, however, is the problem of transporting that which is dug to the point where it is to be finally deposited with such speed and such return of the vehicles of transportation as to enable the shovels to be in constant use. It is a problem of transportation really and not of excavation. These figures suggest the amount of preparation in the way of increasing the capacity of the railroad, of track laying, and of other mechanical devices for disposing of the spoil which must be made before the "dirt begins to fly."

In addition to this work, machine shops of the French have to be repaired and in some cases rebuilt. Wharves are being put up now in order to furnish additional berths for steamers at Cristobal on the one side and at La Boca on the other. There are to-day engaged on the railroad proper about 4,000 employees—that is, there are 2,500 paid for six days' labor, but they are not perhaps the same 2,500. In addition to this there are 13,000 laborers on the pay roll of the Commission, and that means about 10,000 effective laborers per day. As the work of construction of houses goes on, as the capacity for housing and feeding and properly attending to laborers proceeds, we may look for an increase in the pay roll.

One of the great burdens of the present situation is the procurement of transportation and proper disposition of the immense amount of supplies and material and equipment which have to be ordered and pressed forward to the Isthmus. The Commission bought two large freight steamers costing $1,300,000, or $650,000 apiece. And even with these and three others owned by the Panama Railroad which came into the possession of the Commission, there is still such an immense amount of freight that there is much difficulty in getting the orders and the requisitions of the chief engineer supplied. The following is a list of the principal items of material purchased and delivered, or now under order, and will serve to give an idea of the vastness of the undertaking and why congestion in sea transportation and on the railroad, with all the commercial traffic besides, may be pardonable: Sixty-one steam shovels, 1,300 flat cars, 12 rapid unloaders, 22 unloading plows, 13 earth spreaders, 324 dump cars, 12 hoisting engines, 120 locomotives, 5,000 tons of steel rails, 125,000 cross-ties, 12,000 pieces of piling, 14 air-compressing machines, 3 cranes, 152 rock drills, 30,000,000 feet lumber (approximately), 2 dipper dredges, 646,000 pounds blasting powder, 617,500 pounds dynamite, 7,000,000 paving brick, 3,500,000 building brick, 500,000 square feet roofing tile, 36,000 barrels cement (approximately), 3 steel water tanks and towers, 12 standpipes, 2 ocean steamships.

The Panama Railroad on its own account has also purchased during the last six months: Five hundred box cars (40-ton), 12 caboose cars, 10 refrigerator cars, 6 passenger coaches, 24 locomotives, 2 wrecking cranes, 1 locomotive crane, 1 pile driver, 3 track scales (100-ton), 1 modern coal-hoisting plant, 1 cantilever crane for coal-hoisting plant.

It should be borne in mind that all of the large equipment like locomotives, cars, steam shovels, dirt spreaders, and cranes have to be knocked down and boxed in order to have them carried by vessel to the Isthmus and there unboxed and reassembled before available for use. Still, as Mr. Stevens himself told me, everything grows better from month to month. The exasperations and frictions of early organization are passing away as matters move with more smoothness. A quarantine of Panama on the one side and of Colon on the other much delayed the delivery of material, and brought seventeen ships into La Boca at one time for unloading. These discouragements, so characteristic of the Tropics and of great works in the Tropics, at first seem insurmountable, but to an engineer having the patience needed for any enterprise in the Tropics they can be overcome, provided he applies himself to his task with constantly renewed effort. Another great work by the engineer department is the taking of borings and the finding of data upon which to proceed in the detailed construction of the canal. Parties of engineers go out and stay for months measuring capacity of natural basins, the flow of water in the tributaries of the Chagres and other rivers, and thus procure the facts upon which the chief engineer and the Commission must proceed in developing the detailed plans for the ultimate building of the canal.

During the reading of the above the following occurred:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask permission to incorporate that part of the speech of Secretary Taft indicated by the marks on the various pages, and ask that the further reading be discontinued to save the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed. Without objection, the paragraphs as indicated will be printed. [After a pause.] No objection is heard.

Mr. MADDEN. All the work indicated in the speech of Secretary Taft has called for the attention of the best minds in the country, and it is sure to result in making the Isthmus eventually an agreeable place to live and a place to which men seeking employment will be attracted. The necessity for all this preparatory work must be apparent to everyone. Without it no one could be induced to live on the Isthmus at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask unanimous consent for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House that general debate continue until 5 o'clock, one half to be in charge of the gentleman from Georgia and the other half to be under my charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate continue until 5 o'clock, the time to be equally divided between the two sides, to be controlled one half by the gentleman from Georgia and the other by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, this is a request to continue general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I object if it is necessary to speak at once. I desired a moment to have a little conference with my associates.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why do you want it?

Mr. LITTAUER. Because we have two or three requests for a little time; I have three requests for five or ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is nobody on this side who wants to talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Gentlemen on that side can ask unanimous consent for five or ten minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] None is heard.

Mr. MADDEN. The work of construction could not and can not begin until the completion of all this necessary sanitary work. It would have been impossible to make the sanitary improvements and do the other work which has been done and is yet to be done, except by the Government itself. The sanitary arrangements will soon be completed, and the work of construction must of necessity then begin. The question is under what method is this work of construction to be pursued? Shall it be under the direction of the Government officials employing labor by the day or will it be wiser to prepare plans and specifications and invite bids from the contractors of the United States, under which the work can be let in sections at a price fixed in advance, with a time limit in the contracts for a completion of the work?

It would seem to me as if there can be no doubt that the most economical and expeditious manner of carrying this work forward will be under the contract system, for it will not be denied that contractors, having the necessary capital and experience, would be much better qualified to enter upon such a task with the incentive before them of what profits might be made by strict attention to business and to the work committed to their care, surrounded, as they would be, by an efficient corps of assistants, every one of whom would bring to the task assigned him an experience which can not be procured on a monthly wage.

A remarkable work of a similar character, although on a somewhat smaller scale, has been completed by the sanitary district of Chicago, which constructed a channel 34 miles long—24 miles in rock, 160 feet wide, 36 feet deep, and 10 miles in clay of an equal width and depth—at a price not to exceed $30,000,000 as the original cost of construction, and this price included the purchase of 10,000 acres of land for the right of way, the actual work of excavation covering a period of approximately five years.

Mr. WANGER. Was the drainage canal constructed by the commission or by contract?

Mr. MADDEN. By contract. I will say to the gentleman it was carried on in an expeditious, efficient, economical, and honest manner, in line with ordinary business methods, under the direction and supervision of a board of commissioners elected by the people; and it stands to-day without a peer in public work constructed in any section of the world under public management. It never could have been constructed within the time nor at the price except under the contract system. With such a result and with such an example before us, why not profit by experience and apply the same principles to the construction of the Panama Canal, dividing the work into such sections as the engineering organization consider feasible and best to most efficiently overcome the peculiar physical conditions which exist on the Isthmus?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] asks unanimous consent that his colleague have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. In this way we can secure the experience of contractors expert in every particular class of work to be accomplished, with knowledge of modern and efficient business methods, and with their ability to put the same into actual operation and to secure the very best results therefrom. It is believed that the various problems which are now present to vex and annoy us would disappear under the application of the contract method. The most important question as to the probable cost and probable time of completion would be settled in the terms of the contract. The labor question would be removed from the political arena and resolve itself into a detail difficulty which contractors with experience would be easily able to overcome. The possession of the old machinery, talked about by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], found on the Isthmus at the time this Government secured control of the work and the new machinery since purchased could be turned over on reasonable terms and conditions to the contractors, and gradually charged out against their accounts on a percentage basis as the work progressed, letting the profits of the work absorb the cost to the contractors.

Diligent research fails to reveal any objection to the application of the contract method, but indicates that there is every reason in favor of and none whatever against it. In fact, it seems to be the only hope for an early and aggressive campaign of construction. And believing this as firmly as I do, I introduced a bill a few days ago which has for its purpose the passage of a law providing for the construction of the canal under the contract system. And it is my earnest hope that after all the sanitary arrangements are completed on the Isthmus, and it could not be done before they are completed, that the President and those under him in charge of this great project will be able to see the advantage to be gained by this method of conducting the work. And I am glad to be able to say here and now, that only a day or two ago, at Cincinnati, in a speech made there before one of the public bodies of that city, Mr. Shonts, president of the Isthmian Canal Commission, said it was the fixed policy of this Administration to construct the canal by contract, and that just as soon as the sanitary arrangements were completed and they were able to determine the character of the canal and prepare the necessary plans and specifications, they would invite bids, and that if these bids were in keeping with the best judgment of experienced men on what the work should cost, that every particle of the work from thence onward should be let and conducted under the contract system. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding one minute? None is heard.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, if American workmen could be used in the construction of this canal I would be opposed to the repeal of the eight-hour law as applied to the Isthmus, for I sincerely believe that eight hours is all an American should work there or anywhere else. If the contract system is finally adopted the work will be carried on every hour of the twenty-four. The investment in machinery in such a project as this must of necessity be enormous, and to leave it idle would be to employ the capital invested but part of the time, and this no contractor would do. If, on the contrary, the Government should continue to do the work by the day the officials are no less obligated to work this machinery continuously. There can be no justification for the pursuit of any other course, and surely no other course will be tolerated by the American people. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to enter into any extended argument about the method to be adopted in the construction of this canal, but principally to correct certain misapprehensions which may arise from some things that have been said in this debate. It has been said that the chief mistake has been that work has been done without any plan for the kind of canal to be constructed. There is a general plan for the construction of this canal recommended by the Commission appointed under the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899. That commission was composed of very able men. In addition to two civilians and a naval officer, it included George S. Morrison, now deceased, who was one of the leading engineers of the country; Colonel Ernst, one of the most experienced and able officers in the Corps of Engineers, War Department; Prof. Lewis M. Haupt, an engineer who has given much attention to the improvement of waterways; Mr. Albert Noble, whose name has already been mentioned and who has planned and directed a great variety of difficult and extensive engineering projects; Col. Peter C. Hains, an engineer of the United States Army familiar with extensive river and harbor works, and Mr. Willard H. Burr, professor of engineering in Columbia College.

Three plans have been proposed; one a sea-level canal, another a lock canal with one or more levels, the third a plan by which breakwaters or dams should be constructed in the bays at both ends of the canal, with the intention of inclosing and raising the water so it might flood a portion of the intervening country on the Isthmus and do away in part with the necessity of excavation. The Commission made a report in November, 1901, recommending a lock canal, with an upper level, the bottom of which should be 85 feet above the level of the sea. They recommended a canal which would be 30 feet deep, and then prescribed the width and the curves and their location. The amount of excavation required was computed, and the expense of the different portions was minutely estimated. The estimated cost for building the canal was $144,000,000. So there is a distinct project before Congress, which, it is reasonable to suppose, was in contemplation when the Spooner Act was passed, in 1902, though not in terms adopted, and, of course, subject to changes in the details of construction. In that act mention is made of the capacity and depth of the canal and construction of the necessary locks. It may be that under the pressure of a demand for the early completion of the enterprise, there has been too much haste, and steps have been taken before sufficient preparations have been made. If there is one thing which it seems to me that the committee and the House should scrutinize very carefully it is these purchases of machinery and equipment to be used in the construction of the canal. It is hardly probable that such large purchases would have been made except upon the theory that it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the work directly, without the intervention of contractors. The act of 1902 seems to contemplate the construction of a considerable share of the work by contract, for the President is authorized——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. In section 5 of that act it said:

> And the President is hereby authorized to cause to be entered into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, completion, and defense of said canal, harbors, etc.

It would seem that we ought to give careful consideration to the purchases of implements and appliances for doing the work until the question of how the work shall be done is decided. It is evident that the work may be divided. Part of it is rock excavation, part consists of the construction of locks, part of excavation of earth or dredging merely, all of which might very properly be divided. Also, the Government might proceed with a distinct section of the work by the direct employment of labor.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this ought to be decided before we proceed with the appropriation of the amount carried in this bill?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I say we should scrutinize these expenditures very carefully until then.

Mr. TAWNEY. I wish to say that the committee scrutinized the matter carefully. We inquired of the Commission and the Secretary of War along that line, and we were informed that it mattered not what the future plan might be, the expenditure for which this appropriation is necessary would have to be made whether a lock canal or a sea-level canal is constructed. This is preparatory work and must be done before going on with the building of either a sea-level or lock canal.

Mr. WANGER. Whether by contract or day labor.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; whether by contract or day labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In view of what the gentleman from Minnesota has just said, if the gentleman will yield to me, what is the meaning of this language:

> For new equipment purchases.

What is the character of that new equipment? Is it not equipment that would excavate?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is already contracted for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care whether it is contracted for or not.

Mr. TAWNEY. "Estimated appropriation, new equipment purchases, payable April 1, 1905, to June 30, 1906, inclusive"—is that the item the gentleman refers to?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I refer to is the language:

> For new equipment purchases, $1,565,768.

Mr. TAWNEY. That refers to 1,000 flat cars, 120 locomotives, 43 steam shovels, 18 unloading machines, plows, 3 water tanks and towers, 2 dipper dredges——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Part of it is for dredges?

Mr. TAWNEY. Part of it is for dredges. They have a fresh-water swamp there at Colon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the Government to do with these dredges if it gives the work out by contract?

Mr. TAWNEY. They will have to use dredges at Colon and Panama, no matter whether they give the work out by contract or do it by day labor. They will have to continue to use dredges for a great many years to come, as they have been using dredges, and that is the only way they can keep the channel clear and utilize the harbor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question before the gentleman sits down. I see part of it is for locomotives. Why should that have been put here under new equipment for the canal? Why should it not have been called new equipment for the railroad, and let it stand upon its own merits?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that the Panama Canal Commission is double tracking the railroad——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the gentleman that.

Mr. TAWNEY. For the purpose of operating the road in connection with the conveying of the material that is excavated, when the excavation commences.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why did not this bill say "for new equipment for the Panama Railroad?"

Mr. TAWNEY. Because it does not belong to the Panama Railroad—is not intended for the Panama Railroad. It belongs to the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you mean to say that the locomotives do not belong to the Panama Railroad?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do; not the locomotives mentioned in that particular item.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And they are not intended to belong to the Panama Railroad?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are not intended to belong to the Panama Railroad. They belong to the Government and are to be operated under the jurisdiction of the Commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So does the railroad.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am proceeding in the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have been asking and have been promised time enough at some time during the afternoon to make a two-minute speech. That promise was made to me sometime ago, and I have been sitting here waiting.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. If my time is extended, I will yield two minutes to my colleague now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman from Ohio being extended to 5 o'clock? The Chair hears no objection. Does the gentleman from Ohio now yield to his colleague from Ohio, General GROSVENOR?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I was greatly interested in the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], especially that part of it which discusses and insists upon the propriety of letting the work by contract. There was something in his remarks that was suggestive of something which I had read very recently, and I find that the entire subject has been gone over very carefully and intelligently by Mr. Shonts on last Saturday evening before the Commercial Club in Cincinnati, in which is used the precise language used by the gentleman from Mississippi, if not the language at least the idea, favoring the letting of the work by contract, the ascertainment in the first place of the character of the work, and the whole line of argument of the gentleman from Mississippi. So I say that we ought to congratulate ourselves that the Democratic side of this House, through its spokesman, the Commission through the head of it, and the Republican side of the House through the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill, all agree upon the great topics we have been discussing here this afternoon.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will print as a part of my remarks the speech of Mr. Shonts reported in the Cincinnati Enquirer of Sunday, January 21, as follows:

CONDITIONS AT PANAMA, AS DEFENDED BY PRESIDENT SHONTS, OF THE CANAL COMMISSION.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMERCIAL CLUB: It is a pleasure to speak of the Panama Canal in the home of Secretary Taft, and to an assemblage of his neighbors and friends. He is a son of Cincinnati and of Ohio in whom the whole country takes pride, for his services on the bench, in the Philippines, and in the Government at Washington have brought honor, not only to his native city and State, but to the American name before the world. I consider it a high privilege to be associated with him under the direction of President Roosevelt in the conduct of the most stupendous enterprise to which this nation has ever put its hand. He brings to this task the broad intellectual grasp, the calm, clear judgment, the complete patriotic devotion and the inflexible, uncompromising, and outspoken honesty that are the distinguishing traits of his public carrer. The value to the country of the services of such a man in its Government can not be overestimated. When the canal shall have been completed—as completed it surely will be—no small share of the credit for the great achievement will be due to his wise counsel, inspiriting cooperation, and unflagging faith in the ability of the American people to solve any problem with which they are confronted.

I am here to-night to talk, as I have said, not of an experiment, but of an assured success. We are not merely going to build the Panama Canal; we are building it. Preparation is a part, and a most important part, of the work of construction. When that shall have been fully and thoroughly accomplished, a great step forward will have been taken. You can not erect a house until you have laid the foundation. You can not run a railway until you have laid the tracks. You can not build a chimney by placing the top bricks first. These are trite truisms, but there seem to be people in this country to whom they are novelties. We are approaching the end of the preliminary work. We have made the Isthmus a healthful place in which to work. We are getting the line of the canal into a condition which will enable us to operate an excavating plant to the best advantage, and we are assembling the plant with which the work is to be done. When you bear in mind that we have been engaged in this preparatory task barely six months, that we have been compelled to carry it forward in a tropical country—mainly a wilderness, not accessible by railway, but 2,000 miles at sea and 2,000 miles from the base of supply—and that most of the material entering into the work had to be manufactured to order before it could be shipped to the scene of action, I think you will admit that the amount of time consumed has not been unreasonable.

THE PREPARATORY WORK.

I shall not burden you with details of the preparatory work. These were set forth by me in a speech before the American Hardware Manufacturers' Association a few weeks ago, and are to be found in the recent report of the Commission to Congress. Briefly summed up, they have resulted, first, in converting the Isthmus from a hotbed of disease into as healthful a place for work of the kind in hand as could be found in any tropical country. With reasonable care a man can go there to live now with no more serious menace to his health than he would encounter in frontier work in our own country. Second, the workers of all grades are provided with suitable and sanitary quarters, wholesome food in abundance and at reasonable prices, and pure water; third, an antiquated, inadequate, and poorly manned railway system has been improved and reorganized on modern lines and provided with up-to-date equipment of locomotives and cars; fourth, new wharves, equipped with modern mechanical appliances, commodious terminal yards at both ends of the railway, extensive warehouses, suitable machine shops, and a modern coal-hoisting plant are rapidly approaching completion; fifth, more than $9,000,000 has been expended in the purchase of supplies and material, largely for an operating plant in the actual work of excavation, and the bulk of this investment is already on the Isthmus.

This vast quantity of supplies has been purchased almost exclusively in the United States. In accordance with our policy of buying in the cheapest markets, we have bought chiefly in the United States, because its markets, in the main, are the cheapest in the world for the products that we need in this work. The American laborer is the highest priced in the world, but we can buy the results of his work more cheaply here than abroad because of his superior skill and because of the intelligent interest which he, as an American citizen, takes in his work. In other words, he puts more brains into the product of his hands, because he is a citizen of a free country and his mind has been enlarged and his ambition stimulated by active participation in the duties of citizenship.

While buying our supplies in the United States we have seen to it that the entire country should be admitted on equal terms to the competition for furnishing them. Our theory is that since the American people are to defray the cost of building the canal the whole American people should be treated alike in the opportunity to derive legitimate industrial and commercial profit from the outlay for construction. One of the first acts of the present Commission after taking office was the adoption of a policy designed to place all manufacturers and producers in all parts of the country on equal terms in regard to shipment of goods to the Isthmus. The chief features of this policy were:

FEATURES OF ITS POLICY.

1. We threw open all terminal facilities on the Isthmus to all steamship lines on equal terms. Prior to this time the Panama Railroad, being a private and not a Government corporation, had endeavored to force the shipment of all canal supplies by way of New York. The management of the railroad required that steamship lines from Gulf ports should charge the same rates from their ports to Colon as were charged by the railroad's steamship line from New York to Colon, under penalty of being deprived of the railroad's dock facilities at its terminals. The result of this was to give great advantage to the port having the shortest rail line from point of production. As New York was much nearer the centers of production than Gulf or Pacific coast ports, it secured the bulk of the business. When the Government assumed control, by purchase, of the Panama Railroad, one of the Commission's first acts was to notify all steamship lines that they could have the use of the railroad's terminal facilities on the Isthmus on the same terms as the steamships of the railroad company, without regard to any rates they might make from their ports of departure.

2. We required all bids for supplies to be made c. i. f. the Isthmus—that is, all bids to include cost of delivery on the Isthmus.

3. In order to prevent any charge of discrimination in rates as between New York and the Gulf and Pacific coast ports we separated the Panama Railroad Steamship Line from the Panama Railroad and threw open the use of that steamship line to all railway connections at New York on agreed percentage divisions. We gave our direct rail connections at New York, as well as all others, the privilege to make rates from all producing territory clear through to Colon. Under this policy the manufacturer situated on the line of a railroad leading to New York has no advantage whatever over the one situated on lines of railway running to Gulf ports. Each can arrange for his own rates straight through to Colon. We went a step farther and adopted the policy of charging the Government on the Commission's shipments from New York exactly the same rates that are paid by any other shippers from that port locally. Our object in these various acts was to protect the United States Government from any charge of favoritism to any section of the country or to any port.

If we had made low rates from New York on our own materials it would have been charged that these were less than private capital could afford to grant, and that therefore the Government should install similar service from the South Atlantic and Gulf ports. We should also have been charged with rebating to ourselves as against other shippers, thus violating the law. What we did was to put the Government on a parity with every other shipper, and all sections of the country on exactly the same footing. If by reason of these policies competition among the railways in different sections of the country shall result in rates below a profitable basis the Government will be the gainer, because it will get the benefit of a reduced cost in the price of its material delivered on the Isthmus. In no case can the Government be a party to any kind of discrimination.

CINCINNATI FAVORED.

You, gentlemen, being situated about equally distant from the Gulf and the seaport, are especially favored under this policy. You will get the benefit of the competition of the railways leading through both gateways, and should be able to secure very reasonable rates of transportation on any goods you may produce and desire to sell which enter the construction of the canal.

I come now to a branch of this subject to which I have referred in my address before the Manufacturers' Association, and also in the Commission's report to Congress, and I bring it up again because there is nothing connected with the construction of the canal that surpasses it in importance in its bearing on results. I refer to the labor question.

The character of labor employed on the Isthmus has more to do with the time it will take to build the canal—more to do with the cost of construction—than any other determining factor.

There is no insuperable difficulty in the way of the construction of the canal from an engineering point of view, and with any ordinary class of labor. The serious problem is to get what will be considered in this country anything like an ordinary class of labor. In examining this question we have studied and discussed the merits of labor of nearly all nationalities available for the purpose. The chief difficulty with which we have to contend in the employment of oriental labor lies in the laws which hedge about its use. In order to comply with the letter and spirit of these laws, the best that we can do is to let out the work by contract, advertise and secure the lowest bidder, who will be nothing more or less than an agent. He will secure the labor, deposit the money required by the government of the country from which the laborer comes for the sustenance necessary to the support of his family while he is away, and advance the money for the necessary transportation. All this is to be included in the cost of the labor delivered on the Isthmus, in addition to the agent's remuneration, making it very high priced. The Government must protect itself against the charge of forcing involuntary servitude, and hence it can adopt no safeguards which will prevent the labor from leaving the Isthmus the day after arrival, thus losing the money necessary to get it there, with no return whatever. The result of this is practically to make oriental labor prohibitive in the construction of the canal.

Experiment with Italian laborers, while not made on a large scale, has not been satisfactory, for the reason that they do not seem possessed of great vitality, and succumb quickly to tropical fevers.

The West Indian negro that we are using has but little life and ambition in him. We are practically trying to wield an inert mass, with the result that we are not getting over 25 per cent, or, from a most liberal point of view, 33⅓ per cent, of the efficiency of the most ordinary labor in the United States. We are now arranging to experiment with 1,000 laborers from the north of Spain. This class of labor was used to great advantage by Sir William Van Horn in the construction of his 350 miles of railroad in Cuba. While not tall, they are of muscular build, docile in temperament, and willing and industrious workers, with enough ambition to want to become subforemen and foremen in their work. In other words, besides being laborers they have a spark of ambition which makes it possible to develop them into something better than brute force. These men have the further advantage of being white, and of speaking the language which most of our foremen either know or rapidly acquire after reaching the Isthmus.

QUESTION AS TO LABOR.

So far as the labor in the United States is concerned, we might as well recognize the facts. The best quality of this labor is regularly employed, because of the great industrial activity here. This confines our selection to those employed only as extra men and those seeking employment, who, of course, will not grade as high as those regularly employed. In order to get these men in some branches of trade it is necessary to pay larger wages than are paid in this country, for they would rather have extra work, with a chance of regular employment here, than leave their own country.

Before closing my remarks in regard to the importance of labor in this enterprise I wish to repeat and emphasize the opinion I have expressed on former occasions in regard to the application of the eight-hour law. The present wage varies from 80 cents to $1.04 per day in gold. As compared with the best common labor in the United States, its efficiency is rated at from 25 to 33 per cent. Over 80 per cent of the employees of the canal are now, and will continue to be, alien laborers. A majority of the other 20 per cent employed will be in a clerical, a supervisory, or in some other capacity to which the various labor laws of the United States are not applicable. It is to this kind of labor we are compelled to apply the eight-hour law—that is, to aliens who know nothing of the law's existence until they arrive on the Isthmus.

Such application will increase the labor cost of canal construction at least 25 per cent. You can readily see why this will be the case. We pay our laborers by the hour. If we can employ them for only eight hours a day, we can give them work for only forty-eight hours a week. If we can employ them ten hours a day, we can give them sixty hours a week. They will accept a smaller hourly wage for sixty hours a week than they will for forty-eight hours. As a matter of fact, the skilled laborers prefer a ten-hour day, and many of them have asked for it, desiring to get the extra two hour's pay. When they work overtime on the eight-hour plan, they expect to get time and a half.

It is obvious that by forcing the eight-hour day upon us millions of dollars will be added to the cost of construction. American labor in this country will have to pay its share in the consequent increase of taxation, and for no appreciable benefit, for, as I have shown you, there are only very few American laborers on the Isthmus. There is no question of American labor involved in Isthmus work, and I repeat what the Commission has urged in its annual report, that it is a mistake to handicap the construction of the Panama Canal with any laws save those of police and sanitation, and that labor on the Isthmus should be excluded from the application of the eight-hour law, the contract-labor law, the Chinese-exclusion act, and any other law passed or to be passed by Congress for the benefit of American labor at home.

WAITING ON DECISION.

As I said at the beginning of these remarks, our preparatory work is nearing completion. It has, in fact, advanced as far as we can carry it safely until we know definitely the type of canal we are to construct, whether it is to be sea level or high level. It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that decision as to this type be reached at the earliest possible moment. I had hoped when I accepted your invitation that before the time to address you should arrive the advisory board would have made its report, and I should be at liberty to speak freely about it and to discuss both the details of the plan decided upon and the methods to be employed in its execution. The members of the board consumed much more time in their deliberation than they had anticipated, and as the two reports which they have decided to make are not yet before the Commission, it would be obviously improper for me to enter upon the subject now.

I am glad to say, however, that whatever may be the type decided upon, it will take us but a short time to complete the arrangements for beginning at once to carry its details into execution on a comprehensive scale. We shall divide the work into sections and prepare specifications asking for bids for contracts for such portions of the work as we think can be done advantageously in that way. We are strongly in favor of doing the work by contract if the type of canal and the prices bid will permit. One of the chief benefits we have derived from the preparatory work is the accumulation of knowledge as to the nature of material to be handled and the cost of handling it, which will enable us to judge whether or not such bids as we may receive will make it desirable to have the work done by contract.

Gentlemen, we are treating this task as a great business enterprise and are seeking to accomplish it by the application of strict business methods, paying no heed to politics or political 'pulls.' Our sole aim and purpose is to give the American people the full worth of every dollar they put into the work and to hand over the work completed to them at the earliest possible day. So long as we continue in control of the job it will be managed on these principles and on these alone. When it becomes apparent that we will not be permitted to build the canal in that way we will step aside and let somebody else take it in hand. In a recent message to Congress President Roosevelt, who is the supreme director of the work, every step of which has been taken with his personal knowledge and with his approval, said:

"All our citizens have a right to congratulate themselves upon the high standard of efficiency and integrity which has been hitherto maintained by the representatives of the Government in doing this great work. If this high standard of efficiency and integrity can be maintained in the future at the same level which it has now reached, the construction of the Panama Canal will be one of the features to which the people of this Republic will look back with the highest pride."

The members of the Commission and those associated with them in the task ask no higher approval than that, neither do they think that any other is necessary to carry conviction to the minds of the American people. In the same message the President also said:

STORIES ABOUT CONDITIONS.

"From time to time various publications have been made, and from time to time in the future various similar publications doubtless will be made, purporting to give an account of jobbery or immorality or inefficiency or misery as obtaining on the Isthmus. I have carefully examined into each of these accusations which seemed worthy of attention. In every instance the accusations have proved to be without foundation in any shape or form. They spring from several sources. Sometimes they take the shape of statements by irresponsible investigators of a sensational habit of mind, incapable of observing or repeating with accuracy what they see, and desirous of obtaining notoriety by widespread slander. More often they originate with or are given currency by individuals with a personal grievance. The sensation mongers, both those who stay at home and those who visit the Isthmus, may ground their accusations on false statements by some engineer, who, having applied for service on the Commission and been refused such service, now endeavors to discredit his successful competitors, or by some lessee or owner of real estate who has sought action, or inaction, by the Commission to increase the value of his lots and is bitter because the Commission can not be used for such purposes, or on the tales of disappointed bidders for contracts, or of officeholders who have proved incompetent or who have been suspected of corruption and dismissed or who have been overcome by panic and have fled from the Isthmus.

"Every specific charge relating to jobbery, to immorality, or to inefficiency, from whatever source it has come, has been immediately investigated, and in no single instance have the statements of these sensation mongers and the interested complainants behind them proved true. The only discredit inhering in these false accusations is to those who originate and give them currency, and who, to the extent of their abilities, thereby hamper and obstruct the completion of the great work in which both the honor and the interest of America are so deeply involved. It matters not whether those guilty of these false accusations utter them in mere wanton recklessness or folly or in spirit of sinister malice to gratify some personal or political grudge."

BIGELOW'S CHARGES.

Thus speaks the President.

A notable specimen of this scandal-mongering literature was laid before the country a few days ago from the pen of a man who had spent twenty-eight hours and ten minutes on the Isthmus. The ten minutes are important, for a person of such extraordinary powers of observation and production can collect an enormous amount of material in that time. He landed at Colon on November 30 at 10 a. m. and sailed away on the same steamer from Colon at 2.10 p m. on December 1. In those twenty-eight hours and ten minutes he accumulated a fund of exact knowledge sufficient to enable him to draw a general and sweeping indictment of the President, Secretary Taft, the Canal Commission, Governor Magoon, Chief Engineer Stevens, Colonel Gorgas, and everything that has been done on the Isthmus since the American Government came into possession of the Canal Zone.

He has been not merely answered, but annihilated by Secretary Taft, and I shall waste no time with him. One point only will I mention as an illustration of his miraculous powers of observation. He said that during a recent rain the volume of water was so great in the sewers of Panama that it "backed the sewage up into cellars and ruined many houses." There is not a cellar in Panama and never has been.

A few days after this masterpiece of mendacity appeared in print I took up the Washington Post, a newspaper which is not open to the charge of extreme partisan support of the Canal Commission, and read therein the following interesting statement:

"Mr. John N. Popham, a former Virginian, who has many friends in Washington, was seen yesterday at the Shoreham. For the past sixteen years Mr. Popham has been engaged in railway building and mining manganese on the Isthmus of Panama and in Costa Rica. He was for five years special agent of the United States Treasury on the Isthmus, and no man is better qualified to speak of the conditions existing in that country. In conversation with a Post reporter Mr. Popham said:

"'Prior to last May the conditions on the Isthmus may have been open to just and intelligent criticism, caused by the delay in improving the physical condition of the Panama Railroad, purchase of necessary rolling stock, and improving the terminal facilities. But those conditions are forgotten history. The fair-minded residents of the Isthmus appreciate the magnificent efforts and splendid results accomplished since that time.

"'The statement made by Mr. Poultney Bigelow is so far from being fair, the views so distorted, and the inference so frail, that it is only laughed at on the Isthmus, and it was so fully covered at home by that part of the President's communication to Congress the 8th instant under the heading of "Scandal mongers," that there is but little left for a self-respecting American resident of the Isthmus to add. The people of Panama are intelligent, capable people. They appreciate the results accomplished; they have been and are anxious and willing to continue to help our people in the great enterprise that means so much to the whole world.

HIS OWN TESTIMONY.

"'After sixteen years' experience on and in the vicinity of the Isthmus and knowing, as I do, the homes of the West India laborers in the great banana-producing district near Colon, Bocas del Toro, and Port Limon, and having for many years employed from 400 to 700 Jamaicans daily at our mines 35 miles from Colon, I feel competent to judge and to tell you that the West India laborer has never known and in his most pleasant dreams has never hoped for the splendid care and liberal treatment he is receiving from our Government on the Isthmus of Panama.

"'My knowledge of the affairs of the canal company only enables me to speak of conditions in the Isthmus and the work in progress there. But in every department of the canal work during the past seven months on the Isthmus the people of this country can rest assured that the investigation to be made by the Senate committee will confirm the following lines found in the President's communication to Congress: "The work on the Isthmus is being admirably done, and great progress has been made."'"

That, gentlemen, is the testimony, voluntarily offered, of a man who can truthfully be called an expert. He has not merely made a twenty-eight-hour visit to the Isthmus, but has lived there or in its vicinity for sixteen years. He is a man of unquestioned character, who has represented his Government honorably there as its financial agent and who has had practical experience in railway building and mining. The testimony of such a man should be final against the inventions and slanders, not only for one, but of any number of scandal mongers.

Speaking for the members of the Commission as well as for myself, I wish to say with all possible emphasis that we not only invite investigation of our acts, but ask for it as a right. If we are doing our work honestly and efficiently, our hands should be upheld; if it is shown that we are doing it inefficiently, we should be removed, and if we are doing it dishonestly, we should be exposed, convicted, and sent to prison. Neither knaves nor incompetents should be permitted to have charge of a task of such magnitude. But while we court the fullest investigation, we earnestly ask that it be made by persons of character and standing, either in public or private life, whose recognized intelligence and fairmindedness are such as to command public confidence, and that it be made upon the ground.

We ask, further, that the investigation be made promptly and ended as soon as it can be and have its work done thoroughly. This is absolutely necessary if we are to maintain any degree of efficiency in the organization. The feeling of uncertainty and unrest which constant agitation about the Commission and its work creates is destructive of that interest in the work which is essential if the best results are to be secured. It is impossible to retain good men in the service under such conditions.

FAIR-PLAY PROTESTS.

We protest, in the name of American fair play, against the dissemination in the United States of libels and slanders upon the efficiency and character of faithful workers on the Isthmus who, by reason of their absence from their own country, can not defend themselves from such assaults. Many of them went to the Isthmus before it was made a healthful place in which to work, and in doing so faced death from disease as the soldier faces it from the bullet on the field of battle. They saw many of their comrades die from disease, but they themselves either escaped it entirely or recovered from its attack. A more loyal, faithful, efficient body of men than these servants of the United States on the Isthmus is not to be found anywhere on earth. Their devotion to the interests of their country entitles them to the gratitude of their fellow-citizens and should protect them from the cowardly attacks of that most despicable of all assailants, the man who stabs in the back.

Gentlemen, I believe in the canal; believe that it can be built in a reasonable time, and believe that when, through American generosity and under American control, it shall be thrown open to the commerce of the world, it will be hailed, and will prove to be, a priceless boon to all mankind. It will justify the faith of the American people in its wisdom and world-wide beneficence, and will justify also the expenditure of millions of American money for its construction. When it shall be opened for traffic the position of this nation in relation to the trade and commerce of the world will be a most favorable one.

We shall have a virtually continuous coast line from the northeastern extremity of Maine to the western extremity of Alaska, open alike to the ships of the Atlantic and the Pacific, and giving to both the opportunity to trade directly with each other. San Francisco will be within fourteen days of New York by steamers making 16 knots an hour, instead of sixty days, and within twenty-one days of any English port instead of thirty-five.

The west coast of South America will be 3,000 miles nearer to our ports than to those of Europe, opening to our products an entirely new field of commerce which has in it great possibilities. These are the broad, general facts in the case, and I need not explain to you that they have in them opportunities that are of incalculable value. They open to the United States new markets for its products, new opportunities for enlargement of foreign trade, which our rapidly growing production is demanding year by year.

WHOLE NATION TO SHARE.

In this enlargement of industrial and commercial activity the whole nation will share. All railway lines, including the transcontinental, will be benefited by the increased traffic which will surely follow. New steamship lines will be opened to accommodate the new trade between the two Americas, and the expanded trade with Australia and the Orient. The world's traffic will be changed to new currents, and in the change all the nations of the earth will profit.

The population of the world one hundred years ago was estimated at 800,000,000; to-day it is estimated at 1,600,000,000. In other words, the growth of the world's population during the past century has been equal to its accumulated growth during the previous ten thousand years. If this ratio of increase shall be continuous, the new population of the globe will find its home, not in the densely populated districts of Europe, but in the sparsely settled countries of North and South America. The development of these countries and of their trade with the Orient, as well as with Europe, will all pay tribute to the Panama Canal, for it will be in the heart of this new growth and the pathway of its commerce.

But great and world wide as will be the material benefits of the canal, the moral and political effects will be no less remarkable and no less salutary. In the United States the inevitable effect will be to develop a stronger and deeper sentiment of national unity than this country has ever known. New and larger trade relations will join the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific coast more closely than even the transcontinental railways have accomplished, and will tend to unify in interest and sentiment all the Americas.

With the canal open there will be no Atlantic and no Pacific fleet, either in the Navy or in the merchant marine, but an American fleet. As an object lesson in the need of an isthmian waterway, the trip of the Oregon in the spring of 1898 from San Francisco to the coast of Florida was the most convincing argument ever adduced. With her powerful machinery working to its utmost limit and everything in her favor, including a commander of the first rank, sixty-eight days were consumed in the voyage. With the canal open she could have made the trip in ten or twelve days and without need of special haste. Instead of two navies we shall have a double navy ready for all emergencies. The ability to assemble our war ships quickly will act as a powerful influence in the direction of peace, for it will operate constantly as a preventive of war. The high position as a world power to which this nation, under the guidance of McKinley and Roosevelt and Hay, has advanced during the past few years will thus be strengthened and enlarged, and American influence upon the civilization of the world and upon the welfare of the human race will be immeasurably extended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman from Ohio sits down I want him to yield for a suggestion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that I have not seen any speech of Mr. Shonts, and if he has, as I am informed, a practical good business sense, I feel like I ought to congratulate myself that my mind, unaided and unassisted by his, has arrived at a similar conclusion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And his, unaided by the gentleman from Mississippi, has arrived at the same conclusion. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, without intending to criticise the Committee on Appropriations or the executive department, it does appear to me that the purchase of dredges and other things of like nature should be carefully examined, because such large purchases can not readily be explained on any theory except that it was the intention that the Government itself should do the whole or a very large share of the work. When this subject was brought up last month, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who is very familiar with the situation, said it was expected in case contracts should be let that it would be made a condition that this machinery purchased by the Government should be used by the contractors. The contractors may not desire to use it, and if they are compelled to do so they may charge the Government a much higher price for their work. At the same time I deprecate much of the criticism that has been visited on the executive officers of the Government for their action. If anyone will read this statute of 1902, he will discover that the authority given to the President is broad and exceptional in its nature. It is indeed a command that he proceed to excavate the canal if the rights of the French company are acquired and the necessary land obtained from the Colombian Government. He would not have been obeying the act of Congress unless he had prosecuted the enterprise with all possible diligence. He had an impatient public behind him demanding that something be done; the public was so impatient that perhaps substantive parts of the work, essential portions in the way of construction, were commenced before the proper preliminary steps had been taken or proper sanitation secured on the Isthmus.

While it is not best to leave the broad general authority to the executive department to go on with the work without resort to Congress for appropriations in the usual way, yet if any mistake were made, if there were too great authority given to the President, it was our act, and the responsibility lies at our door. We do not always realize the colossal magnitude of this work. It is the greatest engineering project ever undertaken. It is a new kind of undertaking for the United States. It is in a foreign land and in a tropical climate.

I can only repeat in regard to the obstacles in the way and the disposition we should maintain, Mr. Chairman, something I said in this House four years ago this month:

In the construction it is probable that there will be difficulties not anticipated, and at times that element which is fickle and sways from one side to the other, an element that is now shouting the loudest for a canal, will say that it would have been better if we had never undertaken it. But the unanswerable argument for this project is that the developments of this commercial era demand a waterway between the two great oceans.

It is the next great step in the commercial growth of this country, and if we enter upon it we must do so with no thought of turning back. It is desirable that we should go at it wisely, deliberately, and select the best route, and, when this has been done and the way has been cleared, go ahead with that vigor and pluck which characterizes the American citizen in peace or in war. In the march of progress the dreams of one century are the realities of the next. For four hundred years a canal has been under consideration. It has been attempted by Spaniards and by Frenchmen. It has engaged the attention of men of many other nationalities. Now, let this country, with its unlimited resources, with its great energy, with its ambition for the future, like a giant, take hold of this enterprise and push it to a successful completion.

And in pushing it to a successful completion it will be desirable to give a great deal of latitude to those who have charge of the work. Whether it should be directed by a commission or should be under the general charge of one man is a question perhaps worthy of discussion. While there should be intelligent review of the methods adopted and the most careful examination of all expenditures, if we are to prosecute this work successfully and finish it within the time within which it ought to be finished, it will be necessary for us to appropriate money whenever it is needed and not to indulge in any spirit of carping or of undue criticism. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the rereading of a speech delivered four years ago by the gentleman who has just taken his seat suggests to my mind that the gentleman himself to some extent was endowed with the spirit of prophecy when he spoke four years ago of that vacillating spirit of change here and there with regard to this great enterprise. I see that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has been disturbed by that spirit of vacillation which the gentleman prophesied might occur. Twice the House of Representatives and once the Senate, by affirmative votes, almost unanimously, upon a proposition for the construction of this great canal, emphasized this idea: That in the construction of that canal the power to build and responsibility for building should be lodged in one person, and that person the President of the United States. Ample reasons were given. It was known that the enterprise was immense in character; it was known that it would involve an immense expenditure of money; it was known that that expenditure would be far remote from the United States, from the centers of business, far from the espionage of newspaper men, from those guards that often are so effective in preventing scandals and wrongdoing. There those who had charge of this matter would be isolated. There were no possibilities of finding units of cost by which men could properly estimate what ought to be paid for a given work. New conditions existed there—climatic conditions; new conditions of labor existed there that our contractors in the United States were unfamiliar with and that they could not foresee. Disease was recognized as an important factor, and the difficulties of sanitation were always recognized, and so it was thought wise and proper by this House and by the other—because the Senate once passed one of the House bills where no commission existed and where all the power was lodged in the President, and all the responsibility was placed in him—to concentrate power, and so to impose responsibility upon one person. This House refused its consent that even a commission should exist. It wanted no person behind whom that man charged with responsibility and invested with power could hide—and I do not use that phrase disrespectfully. We would not consent that the brothers and the uncles and the nephews of Senators or of defunct Senators should have participation there in responsibility or power in the construction of this canal; and so, until we were forced to accept that proposition that we now are laboring under, until that coercive means was brought to bear upon this House, it had studiously refused to have aught to do with commissions or in any way to divide responsibility or to curtail power. Now, the President has that power, but before he begins to exercise it the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests to us that he wants to tie his hands with regard to the methods that should be pursued; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], possibly in order that some of the Chicago veterans in contracts should dabble in this matter, informs us that he has introduced a bill that takes away some part of this power and responsibility and compels the President to pursue a course of action that will let these gentlemen, who have engaged "in the greatest up to this day enterprise" have part and parcel——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may continue until he has concluded his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thank you. I shall not occupy but a moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want this policy to be changed at the very outstart of the work. I want this responsibility to remain where it is, and I want the power to go hand in hand with that responsibility. I do not want anybody to divide with him the responsibility for this great work. It is better to concentrate it in one person and make one man alone responsible that it be done and be done well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will remember that he and I were in strict accord upon the question of charging the Executive with the construction of this work. Since that time that plan has been changed, not by his efforts, nor by mine, nor by our agreement except under coercion. We now have a Commission. Now, then, we are confronted with a new question, are we not, as to whether we would rather have that which we did not want or to put out the work by contract? I will go back with the gentleman to putting this work under the power of the President and War Department, with absolute responsibility to the American people, but it is not there now.

There is an intermediary dividing this responsibility, and behind which, as the gentleman said, the Executive can hide, and I use the word in no disrespectful sense.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I will admit that there has been——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. A moment ago the gentleman from Iowa said the gentleman from Illinois probably introduced a bill to let this work by contract, with the hope, perhaps, that some of his friends who were engaged in the construction of the sanitary canal in Chicago——

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I did not say that——

Mr. MADDEN. Might participate in the benefit to be derived from such character of work on the Isthmus. I want to say to the gentleman, in reply thereto, I am interested in no man who is engaged in the contract business, either in Chicago or in any place else on the American continent, and that I am only interested in one thing, and that is in the construction of this canal by the American Government at the lowest price at which it can be constructed legitimately in the shortest space of time possible. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. "The jade, she doth protest too much." I did not make any charge of that kind. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that there has been a modification of this plan, and I want to say further that this House twice has tried to restore the proposition of the old scheme. Twice the House insisted upon the elimination of that Commission, and another body has thwarted that purpose; and I want to say so intent has that other body been that they were willing that this Zone should be, as it is to-day, without any legislation as to its government. They preferred that chaos should rule there rather than give up their participation in the appointment of those who should have control over this matter of construction. But while it is true that in a sense the plan has been divided there, yet in practice it has not, for the President, with abundant authority, authority that he has exercised as far as in the assignment of duties, has so apportioned the power of the Commission that they do not interfere with these responsibilities and with this power that he must exercise, and I am glad that it is so. I want to indorse that action. I want to say that in my judgment that was one of the wisest steps that have been taken with regard to this great enterprise; but I want now, Mr. Chairman, to enter my protest against any attempt to change this great policy further than it has been changed, of centralizing and unifying the responsibility and power for construction.

We have it now, I believe, practically in good hands, and I want gentlemen to possess their souls in patience and remember that under the situation that exists there some things must be done preceding the actual digging of this canal. Sanitation is essential. Residences are absolutely necessary for the men who are to do the work. The assembling of this great force of men peculiarly adapted, when there are so few who are adapted for exertion in that climate, takes time, and it takes time to work out all the details of the plans. And I want to further suggest that if in the wisdom of the President he thinks it best, the very scheme the gentleman from Mississippi advocates and the very scheme that the gentleman from Illinois promises at an early date he will advocate, may be adopted. There is nothing in the law to prohibit the plan that they think should be adopted, and it may be wiser in time to adopt this plan of letting, and I want to say further to the gentleman from Mississippi that even if that should be done no expenditure that has been undertaken up to this time will be an unwise expenditure, because the machines that are now being prepared and procured, the railway that is now being constructed, the buildings that are being erected, the assembling of hands that is now going on—all of these will facilitate the building, and all of these aids, I take it, will be considered properly and fully when the lettings are to be agreed upon; all these aids will be taken into account when the contracts finally are let. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12320—the general deficiency bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONSTRUCTION OF DAMS AND POWER STATIONS ON THE TENNESSEE RIVER AT MUSCLE SHOALS, ALA.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill H. R. 297.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the following bill, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 297) to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person, company, or corporation having authority therefor under the laws of the State of Alabama may hereafter erect, maintain, and use a dam or dams in or across the Tennessee River, in the State of Alabama, at such points at Muscle Shoals as they may elect between the western line of Lawrence County, Ala., and the mouth of Town Creek, in the northwestern part of said county, along the southern bank of said Tennessee River, for the purpose of erecting, operating, and maintaining power station and to maintain inlet and outlet races or canals and to make such other improvements as may be necessary for the development of water power and the transmission of the same, subject always to the provisions and requirements of this act, and to such conditions and stipulations as may be imposed by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That detailed plans for the construction and operation of a dam or dams and other appurtenant and necessary works shall be submitted by the person, company, or corporation desiring to construct the same to the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, with a map showing the location of such dam or other structures, with such topographical and hydrographic data as may be necessary for a satisfactory understanding of the same, which must be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before work can be commenced on said dam or dams or other structures; and after such approval of said plans no deviation whatsoever therefrom shall be made without first obtaining the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not interfere with the navigation of the Muscle Shoals Canal located on the north side of the Tennessee River or the navigation of the Tennessee River: And provided further, That said dam or dams and works shall be limited only to the use of the surplus water of the river, not required for the navigation of the Muscle Shoals Canal on the north side of said river, and that no structures shall be built and no operations conducted by those availing themselves of the provisions of this act which shall injure or interfere with the navigation of the Muscle Shoals Canal or impair the usefulness of any improvement made by the Government in the interest of navigation.

SEC. 3. That the Government of the United States reserves the right, at any time that the improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee River demands it, to construct, maintain, and operate, in connection with any dam or other works built under the provisions of this act, suitable lock or locks or any other structures for navigation purposes, and at all times to control such dam or dams or other structures, and the level of the pool caused by such dam or dams, to such an extent as may be necessary to provide facilities for navigation; and whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of such lock or other structures, the person, company, or corporation owning and controlling such dam or dams or other structures shall convey to the United States, under such terms as Congress shall prescribe, titles to such land as may be required for the use of such lock and approaches, and in addition thereto shall grant to the United States, free of cost, the free use of water power for building and operating such constructions: Provided, also, That the person, company, or corporation building, maintaining, or operating any dam or dams or other structures under the provisions of this act shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise, and the nearest State or Federal court shall have jurisdiction to hear suits to recover compensation for alleged damage.

SEC. 4. That all the rights acquired under this act shall cease and be determined if the person, company, or corporation acquiring such right shall at any time fail to comply with any of the provisions or requirements of this act, or with any of the stipulations that may be prescribed by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall in no manner interfere with or impair the rights of any person, company, or corporation heretofore authorized by Congress to erect a dam or other structures for the development of water power on the Tennessee River.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

The amendments by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 7, page 1, strike out the words "western line," and strike out all of lines 8 and 9 and line 10 to and including the word "River" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "mouth of Malletts Creek on the east, and the western line of section 16, township 3, range 10, on the west."

In line 13 on page 1, after the word "improvements," insert "on the southern bank of the Tennessee River."

Add at the end of section 3 the following: "The person, company, or corporation owning or operating such dam shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon and such fishways as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe."

At the end of section 4 add the following: "or in case a person, company, or corporation authorized by the laws of the State of Alabama to erect and maintain a dam and improvements, as contemplated by this act, shall fail to begin the erection of said dam and improvements within two years after being so authorized and shall fail to complete the same within five years after obtaining such authority."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] if this is the same bill that was before the last Congress and was finally beaten by the vote of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The Fifty-eighth Congress? No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I was informed that it was.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No, sir; there was a similar bill——

Mr. PAYNE. I notice that it assumes the right of eminent domain.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill itself provided for wiping out of private rights.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is not the same bill at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not this bill assume that they have the right of eminent domain, and by virtue of that right provide a method of absorbing of private rights there by condemnation?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I so understood it as the bill was read.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this bill simply gives the consent of the Government. The corporation that exercises any right under this bill must obtain it either from the State of Alabama——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And from the Government.

Mr. MANN. I will say that a bill for the same purpose did pass this House in the Fifty-seventh Congress, but did not become a law.

Mr. PAYNE. Was there not a bill for a similar purpose before the last Congress?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. There was a bill for the establishment of a dam at Muscle Shoals before the last Congress, but a totally different bill from this one.

Mr. PAYNE. Did it not reach the House, and was it not beaten after discussion?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It never reached the House at all. It never got past the committee, and was never up for discussion.

Mr. MANN. This bill has not only met the approval of the committee, but of the War Department.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And not only of the War Department, but the Chief Engineer of the United States Army in very strong and complimentary terms.

Mr. PAYNE. On the assurance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] that it does not provide for the condemnation of private rights, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. ACHESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ACHESON] asks unanimous consent for present consideration of a bill (H. R. 11045) of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11045) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, has this bill the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. WANGER. It has the unanimous report of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And contains the usual provision?

Mr. WANGER. This bill is simply to extend the time which was authorized by a bill which has been heretofore passed, in order that the work may be begun and finished.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from February 21, 1906."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ACHESON, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State regarding representation by the United States at the Third International Conference of American States, to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, beginning on the 21st day of July next.

I join in the recommendation made by the Secretary of State that the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated for this purpose.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

DEPARTMENT METHODS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

On June 2, 1905, I appointed a committee on Department methods to investigate the business methods and practice of the Executive Departments, and to report plans for their improvement. This committee has taken up its great task vigorously, and material benefit to the Government service has already resulted from its efforts.

Much valuable information has been gathered, and the preliminary work is largely done. The time has now come for the committee to assign trained men to the detailed investigation of routine throughout the Government service, as a basis for definite steps toward added economy and efficiency. Many men already in the Government service can be assigned temporarily to this work, and some of them can be properly paid under the appropriations against which these salaries are charged. Others must be obtained from outside. The committee on Department methods will need the assistance not only of efficient men in the Government service, but also of recognized business experts from private life. To that end, I ask that the Congress provide an appropriation of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), to be expended under the direction of the President for the payment of salaries and expenses of specialists and experts to investigate and report upon business methods and practice throughout the Government service. Since the work of the committee on Department methods has already reached a stage where the employment of such experts is necessary, this appropriation should be available immediately and until expended.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN SAMOAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with accompanying papers, ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

In connection with the matter of this Government's obligation to pay to that of Germany the sum of $20,000 in settlement of certain Samoan claims under the convention of November 7, 1899, between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain, and the decision of the King of Sweden and Norway as arbitrator under the convention, which I forwarded to the Congress on December 15, 1905, I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State showing the obligation to pay, under Article III of that convention, the sum of $760 in settlement of Danish claims.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, showing the acceptance by the International Prison Congress of the invitation to hold its next meeting in the United States, extended in pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress, approved March 3, 1905.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and, with accompanying papers, ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

Referring to section 32 of the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith three ordinances (enumerated in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State) enacted by the executive council of Porto Rico, with the approval of the governor thereof.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1906.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DICKSON of Illinois, for ten days, on account of sickness in family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SPARKMAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Henry Sistrunk, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. LITTAUER. I renew my motion to adjourn, Mr. Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a report of Special Agent Charles M. Pepper on trade conditions in Canada—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation for purchase of a manuscript of a chronological history of the Department of State—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a report of Special Agent Lincoln Hutchinson on trade conditions in Brazil—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and letter only ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for improvements for the Central High School—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Olympia Harbor, Washington—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Brunswick Harbor, Georgia—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9051) granting an increase of pension to Asher S. Bouden, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 433); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 15) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie E. Shehan, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 434); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 23) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Bradbury, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 435); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 76) granting an increase of pension to Hartwell C. Keyes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 436); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 82) granting an increase of pension to Curtis A. Carpenter, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 437); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 85) granting an increase of pension to Edward Keaster, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 438); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 99) granting an increase of pension to Eugene P. Kingsley, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 439); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 113) granting an increase of pension to John D. McFadden, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 440); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GUDGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 135) granting an increase of pension to Peter P. Chacey, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 441); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 137) granting an increase of pension to Robert Wiper, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 442); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CHANEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 144) granting an increase of pension to Minerva Briggs, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 443); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 147) granting an increase of pension to Patrick McCue, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 444); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 149) granting an increase of pension to Cassius Lisk, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 445); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 150) granting an increase of pension to Lucius A. Lincoln, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 446); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 157) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie G. Reynolds, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 447); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 168) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Davis, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 448); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 182) granting an increase of pension to Oliver P. Smith, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 449); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 184) granting an increase of pension to Lyman Marsh, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 450); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Nebraska:

I, A. Galusha, secretary of state of the State of Nebraska, do hereby certify that the within is a full, true, and correct copy of the memorial and joint resolution (house roll No. 174) as passed by the legislature of 1905, and appears upon the records of this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Nebraska. Done at Lincoln this 28th day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and five, of the independence of the United States the one hundred and thirtieth, and of this State the thirty-ninth.

[SEAL.] A. GALUSHA, Secretary of State,
By FRED. W. MILLER, Deputy.

House roll 174—Memorial and joint resolution in relation to the Nebraska Territorial Militia.

Whereas the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congress failed to pass any bill to establish the true status of the Nebraska Territorial Militia, who served ninety days in subduing the several raids and depredations of hostile Indians between 1862 and 1864 and were honorably discharged;

Whereas these volunteer soldiers were called and mustered into active service by our Territorial executive officers, appointed by the Federal Government, at a time when all its forces were engaged in the South suppressing the war of the rebellion;

Whereas the settlers of the border Territory, the overland mail, and the emigrants to the Rocky Mountain district were justly entitled to the fullest protection of the Government of the United States as against the unprovoked acts of marauding bands of Indians, its acknowledged wards: Be it

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be again requested to renew their best and earliest endeavors to procure the passage of an act similar to the one passed in February, 1895, giving the Missouri State Militia title to pension; and

Resolved, That the honorable secretary of the State of Nebraska be requested to forward a certified copy of this memorial to each of our Senators and Members of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

GEORGE L. ROUSE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:
JOHN WALL,
Chief Clerk of House of Representatives.

He also presented a petition of the New Jersey Historical Society, of Paterson, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a United States Historical Commission; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Federation of New Brunswick, N. J., remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on cigars and tobacco imported from the Philippine Islands; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bayonne, N. J., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Trenton, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of Indian trust funds for sectarian schools; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 69) regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CRANE, from the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 17th instant, proposing to appropriate $40,000 to enable the Government of the United States to take official part in the international exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, during the year 1906, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 3573) to protect the rights of women citizens of the United States to register and vote for Members of the House of Representatives; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (S. 3592) permitting the St. Louis, San Francisco and New Orleans Railroad Company (formerly the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company), the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company, the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company, and the Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company, and each or either of them, to sell and convey their railroads and other property in the Indian Territory to the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. RAYNER introduced a bill (S. 3593) granting an honorable discharge to Joseph P. W. R. Ross; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3594) granting a pension to Sebastian Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3595) for the relief of the legal representatives of John N. Gatewood, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. OVERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3596) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to recommission and change the rank of Emmet C. Gudger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LONG introduced a bill (S. 3597) granting an increase of pension to Nathan T. Reed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GAMBLE introduced a bill (S. 3598) granting an increase of pension to Charles D. Brown; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3599) granting an increase of pension to William Orr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STONE introduced a bill (S. 3600) granting an increase of pension to Henry A. Crandall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3601) granting an increase of pension to Theodore M. Burge; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (S. 3602) to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3603) to incorporate the American Institute for Drug Proving.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 3604) to purchase a painting of the several ships of the United States Navy, known as the "Squadron of Evolution," and entitled "Peace;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a bill (S. 3605) granting an increase of pension to Albert Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HEYBURN introduced a bill (S. 3606) granting an increase of pension to John T. Morgan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BACON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 3607) for the relief of the heirs of A. K. Tribble, deceased;

A bill (S. 3608) for the relief of the heirs of William H. Harvill, deceased;

A bill (S. 3609) for the relief of the heirs of John C. Bowden, deceased;

A bill (S. 3610) for the relief of the heirs of Blueford D. Smith, deceased;

A bill (S. 3611) for the relief of the heirs of William McConnell, deceased;

A bill (S. 3612) for the relief of the heirs of William Wilmoth, deceased;

A bill (S. 3613) for the relief of the heirs of James Peek, deceased;

A bill (S. 3614) for the relief of the heirs of John Fisher, deceased;

A bill (S. 3615) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Summerlin, deceased;

A bill (S. 3616) for the relief of the heirs of Willis Miller, deceased; and

A bill (S. 3617) for the relief of the heirs of John M. King, deceased.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 3618) granting an increase of pension to Martha E. Wardlaw; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (S. 3619) to amend the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, and the several acts amendatory thereto; and

A bill (S. 3620) to allow and regulate amendments in judicial proceedings in the courts of the United States.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 3621) for the relief of William H. Crook; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3622) for the relief of the heirs of Warren S. Baxter, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRYE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 23) providing for an extension of time for completing the highway bridge and approaches across the Potomac River at Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GAMBLE submitted the following amendments, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

An amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 to construct a girls' dormitory, kitchen, etc., at the Indian school at Crow Creek Agency, S. Dak.;

An amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to increase the capacity of Hope School, at Springfield, S. Dak.; and

An amendment relative to an investigation of the claims of Drifting Goose and certain other members of the Crow Creek band of Sioux Indians in South Dakota, for loss of property resulting from their removal from their homes in the James River Valley in South Dakota in 1864, and proposing to appropriate $1,053.05 therefor (with accompanying papers).

REPORT OF AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, in style similar to that of the last report of said convention and wrapped for mailing, 600 copies of the Report of the Seventeenth Meeting of the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, being Senate Document No. 105, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 297. An act to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama;

H. R. 11045. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903; and

H. R. 11263. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who desires to submit some remarks.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when I was last discussing this subject, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who I am sorry to see is not now present, referred to a certain publication in the National Druggist with reference to the action of the food commissioner of the State of Minnesota, and declared his hope that this bill was not so drawn that it would allow such offenses as had been committed in that State. He referred to the National Druggist as a magazine published, I would say, in the interest of patent medicines, etc., as a reputable publication. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] felt called upon to defend the action of the food commissioner of that State. I wish to say simply a word with reference to this publication and the influence it should have upon the Senate of the United States or the members of the Senate in the consideration of this most important bill.

I do not desire to challenge to any extent the good reputation of this particular publication. I prefer to leave every person to exercise his own judgment upon what is reputable and what is not reputable. It is apparent from the publication itself that it is the champion of wide-open adulterations and frauds in the matter of food and drug products; that it is the enemy of all good pure food and drug legislation; and, if I may judge from its advertisements, that it is a purveyor of all vile and fraudulent alleged remedies. One can not but be impressed with the truth of this if he will take up one by one the pages of advertising matter and then take up some of the investigations into those things, that are advertised as worthy of the consideraion of the public, found in the public documents of the State of Massachusetts. I will place side by side this journal and the declarations made by the chemists of the State of Massachusetts, appointed or chosen for that purpose, and will let the Senate itself decide, or anyone else who is interested in pure-food legislation, which is the most reputable.

But that we may understand fully another force which is at work to-day against this character of legislation and at the same time understand the animus of this publication against all pure-food legislation, I desire to call attention to page 204 of the number for July, 1905, and we will understand from this the object of a certain organization which is now in the city and whose efforts are to defeat the legislation which we are seeking to have enacted. On page 204 I find this heading: "How to fight pure-food legislation." It goes on to say:

About fifty representatives of food products met at the Waldorf Hotel in New York a week or two ago and formed a National Food Manufacturers' Association. The object of the association, as set forth in the call that was issued, is to obtain the cooperation of the various food and drug industries of the country "in an endeavor to secure a national food law at the next Congress, which law shall be one that will protect the public from unwholesome and adulterated foods and drugs, and at the same time conserve the rights and legitimate interests of the food and drug industries of the United States."

That is said to be the object of this organization.

The necessity for the organization was summed up by Mr. Thomas E. Lannen, of Chicago, who said:

"There will be a food law enacted at the next Congress. Of that there can be no doubt. What we must decide is, shall it be a food law of the manufacturers or of the food commissioners?"

Now, knowing the constituent elements of that association, reduced to simple English it means this: Will it be such legislation as the States themselves have seen fit to adopt in declaring that certain adulterated and misbranded goods shall not be sold within the borders of the State, or will it be such legislation as will enable the manufacturers of jellies and preserves and other such products to use aniline dyes, to use coal-tar products, in the preservation of their particular products, and also to substitute any other food product for the product which is advertised by them as the particular thing which they are selling? That to me, Mr. President, is what the real issue is in a nutshell.

Now, how is this to be accomplished? By certain amendments which this organization is to supply Members of Congress with from time to time and also by a separate bill if possible.

While the National Druggist agrees with them in much of what they are doing, so far as their attempt to prevent any legislation is concerned, it goes on to say:

In spite of all this, however, we believe that it is the part of wisdom to fight the proposed legislation on principle, to make no compromise whatever with the scamps who are behind it, and to refuse to treat with them on any kind of terms.

Speaking then of this Congress, it says:

So far, their opposition has been effectual in forestalling such legislation altogether, and the grafters who have been endeavoring to obtain it will probably agree to any measure that may be proposed if it will secure the cooperation of those who have hitherto stood in the way and foiled their designs.

Again it says:

Therefore, as we have said, it seems to us that the wisest course is to oppose all laws which have for their aim the regulation of private enterprise, under whatever pretext they may be urged.

And again:

There is no demand whatever for such legislation from the general public, who are supposed to be suffering so much from impure and adulterated foods and drugs. Then why should Congress concern itself with an evil about which those whom it is supposed to affect so injuriously make no complaint?

Yet it is said that this is a reputable magazine, a magazine which declares that so long as the people submit to crime and injustice, no matter how apparent it may be, neither Congress nor any other legislative body should interfere with them in the slightest degree in perpetrating such injustice.

This journal also attacks all pure-food officials as criminal grafters. I call attention to the National Druggist of July, 1905, page 205.

I desire to call attention to the statement concerning Lea & Perrin, the Minnesota case, which is pronounced by Commissioner Slater, of that State, as "A chain of misstatements;" by the Commercial Bulletin of Minneapolis, "Wild and ranting," and by the American Grocer, "A fit of hysteria." The Lea & Perrin case was referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. Here is a letter from Julius Hortvet, who is the chemist of the Minnesota State Commission, to Miss Lakey, who is secretary of a subcommittee of the Woman's Clubs of America, or the National Woman's Club Association; I do not remember the name of it. He says:

I have yours of the 8th inclosing circular and clipping.

That is the circular which is copied from the National Druggist.

The circular is, on the face of it, a bit of campaign literature gotten up by the antipure-food crowd. The whole thing is a misrepresentation. Our commissioner has not shut out Lea & Perrin's sauce. Our department has for several years consistently ruled against the use of salicylic acid in food products. We rule it out in catsups and other things; so to be fair and consistent, have applied the ruling to these sauces. This is the only so-called "Worcestershire sauce" I have found that contains salicylic acid. I had a conversation with the chemist who recommended salicylic acid to the manufacturers of the sauce in question, and he said neither he nor they had any preference and their feelings were not hurt on account of our action. They were perfectly willing to fall in line with the others and use benzoate of soda. They say that they are obliged to use some kind of preservative. We do not permit salicylic acid under any circumstances, even when its presence is announced on the label.

The so-called "steel-cut" coffee you ask about has never been analyzed in this laboratory. In order to show whether it is adulterated there would be required a large amount of special work on coffee—work that has not been carried on extensively as yet. I am planning some analyses of coffees, and maybe in course of a year or so can give my opinion on the question you ask. I am pleased to clear up these doubtful points whenever I can.

Very truly, yours, JULIUS HORTVET.

I have a further letter here which I will not stop to read from the company of Lea & Perrin, in which they thank the food commissioner of the State of Minnesota for getting them out of a rut in the matter of the use of these preservatives, and in which they say that instead of the use of these preservatives they now sterilize the bottles, and that they are using no preservative whatever, not even the benzoate that is spoken of here.

Mr. LODGE. If I may interrupt the Senator, I wish to ask for information if that is an English product?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is wholly American.

Mr. LODGE. It is wholly American?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is wholly American, although they do use the name "Worcester" in connection with it, and the label bears the mark of Worcester and New York. There has been some suggestion made by the Agricultural Department that they properly should use a name which would signify that it is wholly an American product.

I do not think it is necessary to cover that matter any further, Mr. President. I know how influential the Senator from New Hampshire is in what he may say upon this floor in reference to the effect of certain drugs. His long experience not only as a physician but as a legislator entitles him to a great deal of credit in whatever view he may take on a question of this kind. I desire, however, simply to say to the Senator that we are living to-day in an artificial age, and therefore we demand an artificial support for the conditions with which humanity is suffering.

The Senator himself, of course, says that he sees no particular dangers from the food products that are generally in use; and yet, Mr. President, one can not look over the United States, viewing the great army of physicians, viewing the hundreds of thousands of drug dispensaries, viewing the great number of advertisements in every magazine and in every paper in the United States, declaring the wonderful medicinal qualities of an innumerable character and kind of cure-alls, without becoming convinced that the health of the people themselves is a material thing that should be looked after by legislators.

Mr. President, we are coming more and more to understand that our health depends more upon the character of food we consume than upon the medicines that are given to allay and destroy diseases. We are coming more and more to understand that a proper diet, varied to meet the conditions of each individual, is not only the greatest panacea for, but also the greatest preventive against the evils with which humanity seems to be afflicted.

If that be true, I insist that there is a moral duty resting upon the Government to insure, so far as it is possible to do it, the health and comfort of every citizen constituting the public. How may it do this? It can not prescribe a dietary course for every individual. It can not declare what this person or that person shall consume. But, Mr. President, what it can do, and what it morally ought to do, is this: It ought to protect the individual against all character of imposition and fraud, so that entering into the markets he may purchase those things without fear which he knows to be conducive to his health and comfort, and above all that he may avoid those things which he knows to be detrimental.

But, Mr. President, at this age no man can possibly prepare his own food or his own drugs. He is therefore at the mercy of his fellow-men. His life is threatened at every point by the greed and the avarice of the manufacturers of drugs and many kinds of food products.

Mr. President, has food adulteration and drug adulteration reached such proportions in the United States that it demands national consideration and a national attempt to eradicate it? The very fact that nearly every State in the Union has passed pure-food laws, the very fact that their commissioners are working night and day to check the great evil of misbranded and adulterated articles of food which are pouring over the border lines of the States, and the fact that organizations are formed everywhere in the United States to check this great evil, seem to be proof conclusive not only of its existence but also of its danger.

Mr. President, several years ago the Secretary of Agriculture desired to make an estimate of the proportion of adulterated and misbranded foods that were sold in the United States. He called to his aid the food commissioners of the several States having food laws; and, in addition to his own investigation, he showed as a result that about 30 per cent in value of all the food products in the United States were either adulterated or misbranded. In order to be conservative, he cut that in two; he brought it down to 15 per cent, and even at those figures the amount of adulterated and misbranded articles which went into commerce every year was $1,175,000,000. To-day it is safely estimated that it is more than $3,000,000,000 per annum. Just think of it! The American people pay out every year for fraudulent and for adulterated articles of food a sum sufficient to pay the entire expenses of the civil war; they pay out enough every year, Mr. President, to pay the national debt three times over, and all for those adulterated and misbranded articles.

Now, if we will bear in mind that from 50 to 60 per cent of our food products consists of flour, potatoes, fresh vegetables, eggs, and a little fresh meat, we will see that of all the remaining many hundreds of articles of food the greater proportion of them are either adulterated or misbranded articles.

I referred heretofore, Mr. President, to the report of the commissioner of food of my own State. He made an examination of hams and other meats, which were imported into the State, and found that every ham or rib—which had been imported—which was examined contained from 25 to 45 grains of boracic acid. I have stated before that when given for medicinal purposes from five to ten grains of that drug constitute a daily dose. He examined the potted chicken and potted turkey put up in cans and shipped into the several States, and he could not find a single can in the entire State which contained the slightest amount of either chicken or turkey. As I have said before, it may be that calf neck and pig jaw are just as good; that they are just as wholesome as chicken or turkey; but what I insist upon is that it is not what the purchaser thinks he is buying, and that he is entitled to have for his good dollar good meats that he thinks he is purchasing, and not counterfeits. That is all that those who stand by this proposed pure-food law insist shall be done.

Let me give another case, one which I cited before, and it brings us back to this question of food. Perhaps one of the most common of all the dangerous diseases in this country is diabetes. We know that physicians prescribe for this ailment a diet—a diet of gluten flour. A physician prescribes that for his patient. The patient goes to any of the stores in the city of Washington or in any of the great cities and calls for gluten flour. He gets a package of 5 or 10 pounds, which is marked "gluten flour." He takes that, and he follows out the prescription of his physician. In a short time he dies. The physician does not understand why his prescription has not had better results. He examines the contents of this package which is marked "gluten flour," and finds that there is no gluten flour whatever in it. Is this true? Doctor Bigelow went around the city of Washington a short time ago and called at thirteen different stores to purchase thirteen packages of gluten flour, and out of the entire thirteen but two or three contained gluten flour at all. All the remainder were frauds.

If I take the reports of Massachusetts—as good a State as that is, and where they attempt to enforce their laws, as I have shown here already this morning—I find that there is scarcely a drug in the market that is not adulterated, scarcely a can of fruit or a can of preserves or canned goods of any kind where a large proportion of them is not adulterated. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is sufficiently serious to challenge the attention of the American people.

Now, let me give an illustration of why we need national legislation. To do that I borrow from a statement made by one of the pure-food commissioners, or, rather, the secretary of the State of Kentucky. He states that in March, 1901, while standing in front of a grocery store in Morgansville, Ky., a woman and her little child came in with a basket and purchased a number of articles of food for their table, consisting of lard, of sirup, of jelly, of sausages. The price amounted to $1.80. She gave the grocer all she had—$1.57—and went away indebted to him 23 cents. Mr. Allen immediately purchased a quantity of each of those articles and analyzed them. He found the sirup was 70 per cent glucose, that the jelly contained nearly everything but fruit juice and was colored with coal-tar dye, the sausage contained an antiseptic, and the lard consisted of beef stearin and cotton-seed oil mixed. Had she gone into the market and bought those articles for what they were, at the very highest retail prices they would not have cost her over 90 cents, and she would have gone away with 67 cents in her pocket, instead of being indebted to the grocer 23 cents; and this, Mr. President, independent of the fraud that was perpetrated upon her, independent of the coal-tar dyes, which her children were compelled unconsciously to consume.

I know our opponents say, "You have got pure-food laws in about two-thirds of the States and you have got commissioners to enforce them; why, then, do they not exterminate these evils?" That can be easily explained by taking the very case which has been mentioned. The lard which was purchased from the retailer in Kentucky was manufactured in St. Louis, the jelly was manufactured in Indiana, the sirup was manufactured in Ohio, the sausage was manufactured in Chicago. Every one of these articles was manufactured in a State outside of the State of their consumption. So, if you got after any man in the State of Kentucky, you would get after the innocent retailer. So it is the manufacturer that must be reached.

I have already explained that in the construction of the interstate-commerce law it has been declared that the term "commerce" not only covers an article in its transit from one State to another, but it protects and shields that article until it is sold in original packages in the State of its consumption; and then if you can find it you can punish the innocent retail dealer for selling it, even if he was innocent of knowledge of its impurity.

It will be seen, therefore, Mr. President, that the root of the evil is planted in that territory over which the State has no control and over which Congress has complete control—that is, the jurisdiction over interstate commerce.

There is another reason which I desire to urge here, and that is the very moral reason that was suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the other day. I want to say, Mr. President, that you can not for years surround a people with crime and deceit and imposition on every side without in time unconsciously affecting the moral character of the people. Constant association with crime and deceit soon dulls our senses to offenses of that character. Mr. President, for that reason alone I think it becomes a moral duty for the nation itself to take hold of this question. Why? Does it not create an absolute disrespect for all law when we severely punish a person for a breach of what is right in one respect while on the other hand we do not attempt in the slightest degree to punish persons guilty of other offenses? What right, Mr. President, has the Government to send me to the penitentiary for five or ten years for trading, we will say, a silver dollar which is one-half lead to a vender of sirup who gives me "pure maple sirup" which consists almost entirely of glucose, with a little of what is called "maple flavoring?" If I should be punished, Mr. President, by imprisonment of ten years for passing a dollar which was 50 per cent good, then I would ask in reason why a man should not be punished twice the length of time for giving me something which was absolutely a fraud from beginning to end?

The American people have submitted to this. They generally submit to fraud and imposition for a great while before they awake to it. They have been so used to being defrauded in what they purchase in drugs and foods that they for years have thought there was no possible remedy, and they would take it as a matter of course, but they are waking up to the imposition. The fact that the reputable magazines in the country and the reputable newspapers in the country are insisting upon some character of action seems to me to be the strongest proof that the people have made up their minds that they will no longer submit to this imposition.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say to-day upon the general features of the bill. We desire to get a bill through here that every Senator can feel will bring about the very best results with the least possible injury to any person or to any business; but if we stand back and say that we will not pass a bill that interferes with fraudulent businesses of any kind, then we shall never in the world get any bill through.

As to the association to which I have referred, I can not but feel that while it sails under a banner which proclaims its desire to get a good pure-food law through Congress, the real intent and purpose, or at least the effect of its action, would be to prevent pure-food legislation of any character whatever. I can cite one example, and that is an amendment which says that they shall file the ingredients of the composition which they sell to the public with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and that the secrecy of that shall be entirely inviolate. Therefore they can call their goods anything they may have a mind to, under a trade name, and that would prevent any State official from in any way interfering with them in the first instance and preventing their sale in the State. Under an amendment of that kind they can simply use all the coal-tar dyes they desire; they can take a little timothy seed, they can take a pail of glucose, they can color it to represent the strawberry color, give it a little flavoring, throw in timothy seed to give it a little appearance of strawberry, a little clover seed if they want to make raspberry jelly out of it, and if they file the composition with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor no one can question their right to import that into any State.

This bill seeks not, Mr. President, to interfere with any legitimate business, but it does seek to protect the public, and we sincerely hope that if there is a prospect now of bringing this matter to a vote before the Senate action may be taken, and that the careful and conscientious attention of every Senator who desires to get a good pure-food law through Congress may be directed to that end.

Mr. HEYBURN. Some days ago, Mr. President, I gave notice that I would at an early day ask that a time be fixed to vote upon this bill. This morning I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for the consideration of the amendments of the bill, and that that consideration shall continue on the 2d day of February until the bill is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill before the Senate, together with the amendments then pending, may be voted upon on the 2d day of February next. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire personally to make any objection to fixing a time that is agreeable to other Senators; but the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is detained at home by illness, before he left asked me to say that he was very much interested in this bill, and that he hoped no time would be fixed until he could have an opportunity to come back and further examine and discuss the bill. I personally have no objection to fixing a time to vote, but, in his absence, I hope the Senator will not ask that a day be fixed now, and that he will communicate with the Senator from Maine before he does ask it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I had not observed, when I asked for unanimous consent, that the Senator from Maine was not present. I think it might be said that I had an understanding with the Senator from Maine that I would not ask in his absence that a time be fixed for a vote on the bill. I will withhold the request for unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator desire to speak on the pending bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not desire to speak on the bill, but unless the Senator desires to proceed with its discussion, I thought I would venture to address the Senate briefly on another subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will indulge me a few moments, then I will yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I can as well speak on this bill as on any other.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill is before the Senate, and I do not want to have it laid aside for a few moments yet.

Mr. President, as the consideration of this bill proceeds new objections are raised from day to day by different Senators—of course in good faith—which it seems wise to consider without waiting for the final discussion upon the bill.

It has been suggested that this proposed legislation partook too much of the paternal in character and that it was not necessarily one of the functions of Congress to determine what may be designated as the small details of the public interest as it affects private individuals. I believe that one of the primary and most sacred duties of a legislative body governing and making laws for a country such as ours is the consideration of private interests relating to the welfare of the individual. Of course, it seems to be more of a legislative function upon casual glance to deal with international affairs, with great financial problems, with high-sounding legislative terms, but we are here primarily, Mr. President, for the individual people.

The word "government" is continually misapplied. The people are the government. The people govern themselves. Sometimes Congress conceives the idea that Congressmen govern the people; sometimes the Executive would seem, from the acts of the Executives—and I do not refer especially to the present head of the executive department of the Government—but, I repeat, sometimes the executive department of the Government would seem to consider that it governed the people. Sometimes it might appear that the other coordinate branch of the Government, the judiciary, thought it governed the people. Neither of these coordinate branches of the Government governs the people. They are only the voice that speaks and the hand that writes the law. It is the people, speaking through these branches of the Government, that govern the people themselves, and when the voice of the people is raised in behalf of a measure of legislation, we can not, as the authorized representatives of the people, ignore that voice.

Now, I appeal to Senators, has there ever been in the history of this country a more universal demand for action upon the part of Congress than the demand that has gone up from one end of the country to the other in regard to legislation upon the pure-food question? It affects the people more than the river and harbor bill; it affects the people more than the public-land question; it affects the people more than the relations between this country and some foreign country, because, unless the people are safeguarded in their individual rights, they care but little for the questions which are sometimes considered to be of larger importance. So I feel this morning like invoking that earnest, prompt consideration and determination of this question which befits the dealing with a question so near to the people as is this.

Mr. President, I have not gone into details as to the specific articles that are foisted upon the public because of the want of protection at the hands of the National Government. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has given a very excellent exposition of the evils that this legislation is sought to remedy. I class the man who foists a bogus or an adulterated drug or medicine upon the market with the man who poisons the spring out of which the unknown public drinks. He does not know who his victim is going to be when he does it. He manufactures it for individual gain and selfishness; but when the physician, standing at the bedside of the sick, diagnosing the case, knowing from his education in the science of medicine that a certin drug will bring relief, writes a prescription, with instructions that that certain drug be procured, contemplating it in its purity, measuring its effect because of his knowledge of it in a pure state, and that prescription is taken to the drug store, and, instead of being compounded of the drugs that the physician had in mind when he wrote the prescription, it is compounded of a substitute, either an absolute fraud or a deleterious composition that will produce exactly the opposite result from that contemplated by the physician when he wrote the prescription, what is the effect? The medicine is taken to the bedside of the helpless sick. It is administered by the nurse in the hope that it may accomplish the result which the physician had in mind; but, on the contrary, because of the fact that it is a fraudulent substitute for the real panacea for the ill, the patient dies. Can you imagine a condition of affairs crying louder for a remedy than that?

Aside from the question of fraud from a financial standpoint, aside from the question of substituting a medicine that, perhaps, does not cost one-tenth what the real substance would cost, aside from the fraud that is based upon the gain in price between the real and the bogus article, the effect upon human life is as serious a question as could be presented in the consideration of a public measure asking for relief through legislation at the hands of Congress. Is that too small a question for Congress to deal with?

Only last Sunday I picked up one of the great journals of this country that ranks among the very best, and I found a very excellent little editorial commending pure-food legislation, commending the regulation and restraint of these bogus articles, and then in the same paper I counted sixty-two patent-medicine advertisements, and advertisements of the worst frauds that could be imagined. I appeal to the newspaper fraternity of the country to assist us in a real and substantial manner in settling this question.

The Post-Office Department could exclude from the mails these papers that carry upon their pages the tempting inducements to those who have real or imaginary ills to invest their money in these poisonous, deleterious, and fraudulent substances. That is one way to reach them.

Congress alone can make effective the laws of the several States prohibiting the manufacture or sale of this class of articles. The States are helpless under the law. Under the Constitution, as it has been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, these goods may go from one State to another in unbroken packages, and it is not until the package is broken that the jurisdiction of the State attaches. The State laws are helpless. There is a cry from every State in the Union—I think I may say that I have within my possession a demand from nearly every State in the Union—that the Congress of the United States should supplement their legislation and afford relief against the impositions that come from one State to another.

Seldom are these forbidden articles sold in the State of their manufacture. Seldom do they bring themselves within the law of the State which would regulate them. What higher duty can Congress perform than that of assisting the State governments in their local self-government in a matter which affects the people so closely?

This principle of self-government to which I have referred begins in the home. It begins with the individual, and it rises through the home and the local community and the various political governments until it reaches here, and we are the last arbiter and should be the first to afford relief.

Mr. President, I do not intend unduly to abbreviate the consideration of this measure. So long as any Senator desires to speak upon it, I am more than content that it should rest in the consideration of this body; but when the hour arrives that it is evident that no Senator desires to speak further upon it, which is evidence that they have no further consideration to add to the wisdom of this body in disposing of it, I do hope the Senate will promptly take a vote upon it, and say to the people that we have time to attend to their wants, we are here to aid not only the individuals but the States, representing the individuals, which can legislate for themselves only within a limited scope. I hope the Senate will act promptly upon this matter, and I say now that at a very early day I shall again ask the Senate to fix a time for the final consideration and determination of this question.

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I take the floor upon this bill, not, however, to discuss it, but to present as briefly as I may my views upon another important subject. I am impelled to do this by recent debate here, more or less critical, of the conduct of our foreign relations by the President, and under circumstances which, with great deference, I can not regard as constituting in any degree wise precedent.

Matters which are being considered by the Senate as an executive body have been debated in open legislative session. Fifteen years of service here has fully confirmed in me the impression, early formed after my advent in this body, that the consideration of treaties and all questions involving our foreign relations are best, save in very exceptional cases, conducted behind closed doors. This, of course, Mr. President, not because there is anything said or done which Senators would wish withheld from our own people, but because it is inevitable that in the perfect frankness which should characterize debate involving our foreign relations many things must be said, and are always said, which, in the public interest, ought not to be said in the hearing of other nations. I am clearly of the conviction, having regard to the peculiar relations created by the Constitution between the Senate and the Executive in respect to the exercise of the treaty-making power, that it is not a healthy precedent to establish, or one much to be followed, that involves public discussion of current foreign relations, including treaties. If indulged at all it ought to be done by a vote of the body since otherwise some feel justified in discussing phases which others feel not at liberty to debate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is whether he does not think it advisable to open the discussion of this question in the Senate? Does he not think it involves something beyond mere treaty relations with the Government of Santo Domingo; that it involves the possible consideration of a new policy on the part of the United States, affecting our relations not only with Santo Domingo, but with all the Caribbean States, Central American and South American Republics? And inasmuch as that departure is threatened, would it not be wise for us to take the entire country into our confidence and discuss it with the aid of a discussion upon the outside by newspapers and periodicals?

Mr. SPOONER. That is a considerable "question." There are phases of the subject, and the larger phases of it, too, having reference to what the Senator is pleased to call the "new policy," which I fancy would be best first discussed in the frankness of executive session. I am conscious of views adverse to that policy, if I understand to what the Senator refers, which I would very much prefer, in the first instance, to utter in executive session; and on general principles, I reiterate, after more experience in this body than the Senator has had, but not so much as he doubtless will have, my conviction that the methods of the fathers in the treatment by the Senate of our foreign relations, all things considered, is a wise one and the one best conserving the public interest of the United States.

Of course one may miss the inspiration of the larger audience, but the debates of the executive session get to be very earnest; they are very frank, they are intensely patriotic, they exhibit great research and industry, and are, in my judgment, the most interesting if not the most valuable of all discussions in the Senate.

I have heard speeches here by Senators now present, and by Senators now gone from here, some of whom are dead, which for learning, eloquence, and patriotic solicitude and forethought for the interest of the United States in foreign relations of delicacy and grave importance, are not to be surpassed, and would have received enduring admiration could they, in harmony with the interest of the people, have been given to the world. By common consent they could not, and so they live only in the memories of those who heard them.

The distinguished and patriotic Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], whose friendship I greatly value, thought it wise and proper to introduce a resolution in the legislative session of the Senate calling upon the President for certain information, including the instructions given to the delegates or representatives accredited to the conference now being held at Algeciras relative to Morocco, in order that the Senate might, sitting in judgment upon the executive conduct of our foreign relations, determine whether they were being conducted in accordance with the traditions of our country or were being conducted in violation of them.

I regretted the introduction of the resolution. I justify the wisdom of the Senate in closing the doors upon its discussion. But notwithstanding, another resolution, general in its terms, dealing with the traditional policy of the United States, which no man in the United States would willingly see disregarded or departed from, opened the way for the full discussion of the subject.

Mr. President, with great respect for those who differ from me, I deprecate the course which has been pursued. I believe that it is not a proper course to be pursued by the Senate in respect of our foreign relations, save in extraordinary circumstances, if at all. The Senate has nothing whatever to do with the negotiation of treaties or the conduct of our foreign intercourse and relations save the exercise of the one constitutional function of advice and consent which the Constitution requires as a precedent condition to the making of a treaty. Except as to the participation in the treaty-making power the Senate, under the Constitution, has obviously neither responsibilities nor power.

From the foundation of the Government it has been conceded in practice and in theory that the Constitution vests the power of negotiation and the various phases—and they are multifarious—of the conduct of our foreign relations exclusively in the President. And, Mr. President, he does not exercise that constitutional power, nor can he be made to do it, under the tutelage or guardianship of the Senate or of the House or of the Senate and House combined.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. What interpretation does the Senator put upon the word "advice" in the Constitution? Can you give advice after a thing has been done?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; you can give advice——

Mr. TILLMAN. As to whether or not a thing has been properly done, but you can not give advice after it has been done.

Mr. SPOONER. I will proceed to answer the question, if I am able.

The words "advice and consent of the Senate" are used in the Constitution with reference to the Senate's participation in the making of a treaty and are well translated by the word "ratification" popularly used in this connection. The President negotiates the treaty, to begin with. He may employ such agencies as he chooses to negotiate the proposed treaty. He may employ the ambassador, if there be one, or a minister or a chargé d'affaires, or he may use a person in private life whom he thinks by his skill or knowledge of the language or people of the country with which he is about to deal is best fitted to negotiate the treaty. He may issue to the agent chosen by him—and neither Congress nor the Senate has any concern as to whom he chooses—such instructions as seem to him wise. He may vary them from day to day. That is his concern. The Senate has no right to demand that he shall unfold to the world or to it, even in executive session, his instructions or the prospect or progress of the negotiation. I said "right." I use that word advisedly in order to illustrate what all men who have studied the subject are willing to concede—that under the Constitution the absolute power of negotiation is in the President and the means of negotiation subject wholly to his will and his judgment.

When he shall have negotiated and sent his proposed treaty to the Senate the jurisdiction of this body attaches and its power begins. It may advise and consent, or it may refuse. And in the exercise of this function it is as independent of the Executive as he is independent of it in the matter of negotiation.

I do not deny the power of the Senate either in legislative session or in executive session—that is a question of propriety—to pass a resolution expressive of its opiuion as to matters of foreign policy. But if it is passed by the Senate or by the House or by both Houses it is beyond any possible question purely advisory, and not in the slightest degree binding in law or conscience upon the President. It is easy to conceive of circumstances in which to pass in legislative session a resolution like that first introduced by my distinguished and learned friend, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], asking the President, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public good, to transmit the correspondence in a pendng negotiation to the Senate, might be productive of mischief. I think the Morocco case is perhaps one which could be productive of mischief in this, that the President's declination, which would be within his power, upon the ground that the public good required that the correspondence should not be sent to the Senate, might give rise to an inference in other countries that something with reference to one or more of the parties was being concealed from them.

Mr. President, I do not stop at this moment to cite authorities in support of the proposition, that so far as the conduct of our foreign relations is concerned, excluding only the Senate's participation in the making of treaties, the President has the absolute and uncontrolled and uncontrollable authority. Under the confederation there was felt to be great weakness in a system that made the Congress the organ of communication with foreign governments; but when the Constitution was formed, it being almost everywhere else in the world a purely executive function, it was lodged with the President. He was given the power, with all other Executive functions, "to receive ambassadors and other public ministers." His exercise of that function can not, under the Constitution, be controlled by any other body in the Government. That is a tremendous power given by the Constitution to the President—the power to receive or reject an ambassador or a public minister or any one of the representatives known to international law as it existed when the Constitution was adopted. That involves not simply the mere recognition of governments or administrations, but it involves sometimes the recognition of a new nation. It involves passing upon the question of independence. It involves decision as to the various changes which occur in the administration or government of nations—one administration or faction in power to-day, another next week, another a month later. The President decides. He was given the power to appoint "ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls," which has been held to include diplomatic agents then known to international law and international intercourse. Those offices are not created by the Congress. The Congress controls the purse, and may not see fit to appropriate compensation for those appointed by the President, but it has been well held and is irrefutable that under the Constitution the offices are created by that instrument, and he is given his own absolute will as to when he will appoint and whom he will appoint——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Except as to confirmation by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin having modified his statement to that extent, I will not allude to that point; but I should like to ask him, he having given us such a luminous exposition of the Constitution, what is the relation between the President and the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate? Do those men never advise?

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator serious in putting to me that question?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am.

Mr. SPOONER. I will give it a serious answer.

The relation of members of the Foreign Relations Committee to the executive department of the Government in its relation to foreign relations is precisely the relation which the Senator from South Carolina and his colleagues sustain to the executive department in its relation to foreign relations. The Committee on Foreign Relations, like the other committees of this body, is not an independent entity. Its members are Senators who are designated by the body to study and report upon certain subjects, and the committee therefore is but the servant of the Senate, as all other committees are. A member of the Foreign Relations Committee, as a Senator, in his relation to the Senate and executive department is only a Senator, just as those who are not on that committee are Senators.

Of course it will sometimes happen that members of the Foreign Relations Committee, charged by the Senate with that particular subject, will obtain information as servants of the Senate, in order to bring it to the attention of the Senate, which other Senators might not seek; but that is all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is a matter of expediency.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not a matter of expediency. It is a matter of industry, and a wise attempt at least to discharge the duty which the Senate has committed to them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They are not compelled to do it by the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to remind him of a fact with which he no doubt is very familiar, that in the Administration of Mr. Madison the Senate deputed a committee to see him in regard to the appointment of a minister to Sweden, I think, and he replied that he could recognize no committee of the Senate, that his relations were exclusively with the Senate. I have no doubt the Senator intended to recall that, but as he stated the exact relations as he understood them, it seemed to bear on that point.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not recall it; I am obliged to the Senator for recalling it; but I think I covered it——

Mr. LODGE. You did, entirely.

Mr. SPOONER. By saying that members of a committee have no relations to any Department of the Government, simply being servants of the Senate, which has the relation to the Departments of the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will explain why I asked the question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The other day I submitted some observations on the Santo Domingo business. In them I brought out a statement from the New York Sun, which is in the RECORD of the 17th, that the present arrangement which is being carried out in Santo Domingo had the approval of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts, both of whom are members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, or rather that those Senators, having objected previously, acquiesced in it; in other words, that they advised with the President and surrendered their own convictions as to the inadvisability of his action there. The statement goes on to say that——

Mr. SPOONER. I have that here. The Senator need not worry himself about that.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is not worrying himself about anything; but I was just trying to get the Senator to give us, if he will be so kind, the relationship between the Foreign Relations Committee and the President. He says they have nothing whatever to do with it, and yet the members of this committee of the Administration party are caught in the act of having something to do with it in advising and objecting and all that kind of thing, unless the Senator denies the statement. If he denies it, I am done with it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator will be done with it——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will be done with it anyway.

Mr. SPOONER. Because I will deal with that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator pardon me for a little common-sense observation there?

Mr. SPOONER. I may wish to judge for myself as to the common sense of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I claim it is common sense. I do not ask the Senator's indorsement of it as being common sense. I assert that it is common sense.

Mr. SPOONER. I must indorse it on that assertion.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. Granting the Senator's contention to be correct, and knowing, as the Senator must acknowledge, that a treaty or any agreement made by the President must be submitted to the Senate for ratification, and it is first referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee's attitude will almost certainly decide its fate, I ask the Senator whether, as a matter of common sense, any President would not prefer to have the advice of his Senatorial friends—advice, the constitutional word advice—and has not the Senator given that advice in his relationship of leader in the Senate and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and a personal friend of the President?

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator through?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I am through for the time being.

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to say that being held down by constitutional obligations and by the rule of courtesy which prevails in the Senate, I feel bound to say that the Senator's question is a common-sense question——

Mr. TILLMAN. For which I am very deeply grateful.

Mr. SPOONER. Only as a matter of politeness.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator convicts himself of insincerity.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the fact that in speaking they must address the Chair. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, if the Senator from South Carolina will possess his soul in patience, I wish to hurry through.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not be in too big a hurry lest we lose something nice.

Mr. SPOONER. I will in time reach the phase of the subject to which the Senator has been alluding.

The President is so supreme under the Constitution in the matter of treaties, excluding only the Senate's ratification, that he may negotiate a treaty, he may send it to the Senate, it may receive by way of "advice and consent" the unanimous judgment of the Senate that it is in the highest degree for the public interest, and yet the President is as free when it is sent back to the White House with resolution of ratification attached, to put it in his desk never again to see the light of day as he was free to determine in the first instance whether he would or would not negotiate it. That power is not expressly given to the President by the Constitution, but it inheres in the executive power conferred upon him to conduct our foreign relations, and it is a power which inheres in him as the sole organ under the Constitution through whom our foreign relations and diplomatic intercourse are conducted. Out of public necessity the President should be permitted to pocket a treaty, no matter if every member of the Senate thought he ought to exchange the ratification. Why? Because the President, through the ambassadors, ministers, consuls, and all of the agencies of the Government, explores sources of information everywhere, it is his business to know whether anything has occurred since the Senate acted upon the treaty which would render it for the public interest that the ratifications be not exchanged. And he is empowered to withhold exchange of ratifications, if upon later knowledge he deems it for the public interest so to do.

The conduct of our foreign relations is a function which requires quick initiative, and the Senate is often in vacation. It is a power that requires celerity. One course of action may be demanded to-night, another in the morning. It requires also secrecy; and that element is not omitted by the commentators on the Constitution as having been deemed by the framers of the most vital importance. It is too obvious to make elaboration pardonable.

We ratified the arbitration treaty unanimously, I believe. The President, in the exercise of the power which no one can dispute, pocketed it. The President may negotiate and sign a proposed treaty, and not send it to the Senate. In such case what would be thought of a resolution asking him to inform the Senate whether he had negotiated such a proposed treaty, and why he had not sent it to the Senate? Having sent a treaty to the Senate, he may withdraw it the next day.

Mr. President, the three great coordinate branches of this Government are made by the Constitution independent of each other except where the Constitution provides otherwise. We have no right to assume the exercise of any executive power save under the Constitution. We can not assume judicial functions. The President may not assume judicial functions. The President may not assume legislative functions. We as the Senate, a part of the treaty-making power, have no more right under the Constitution to invade the prerogative of the President to deal with our foreign relations, to conduct them, to negotiate treaties, and that is not all—the conduct of our foreign relations is not limited to the negotiation of treaties—we have no more right under the Constitution to invade that prerogative than he has to invade the prerogative of legislation.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to suggest to him that he is perhaps using the word "prerogative" in too broad a sense. I do not understand that the President has any prerogatives under the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the power to pardon?

Mr. MORGAN. That is a power derived from the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. That begs the question.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a prerogative of royalty.

Mr. SPOONER. Kings have the power of pardon, which is a prerogative of royalty. The Senator, however, is right in the last analysis. This is not a kingly government.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. SPOONER. In the most technical sense I cheerfully yield to him that this word is not a fit word for this atmosphere, but I have heard a thousand times talk here about the prerogatives of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. That was just a thousand times too many.

Mr. SPOONER. Strictly, I agree with the Senator.

The act creating the Department of State, in 1789, was an exception to the acts creating the other Departments of the Government. I will not stop to refer to the language of it or to any of the discussions in regard to it, but it is a Department that is not required to make any reports to Congress. It is a Department which from the beginning the Senate has never assumed the right to direct or control, except as to clearly defined matters relating to duty imposed by statute and not connected with the conduct of our foreign relations.

We direct all the other heads of Departments to transmit to the Senate designated papers or information. We do not address directions to the Secretary of State, nor do we direct requests, even, to the Secretary of State. We direct requests to the real head of that Department, the President of the United States, and, as a matter of courtesy, we add the qualifying words, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest."

What does the conduct of our foreign relations involve? Does it involve simply, do Senators think, the negotiation of treaties? It involves keeping a watchful eye upon every point under the bending sky where an American interest is involved, where the American flag and citizens of the United States are to be found on sea and on land, every movement in foreign courts which might invade some American interest. It involves intercourse, oral and written, conferences, administrative agreements and understandings, not included in the generic word "treaty," as used in the Constitution. All treaties are agreements, but all international agreements and understandings are not "treaties." (See opinion Taney, C. J., in Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Peters, 570–573.)

Mr. Justice Story, speaking of the power of the President under the Constitution over foreign relations, says (2 Story on the Constitution, fifth edition, sec. 1567):

> That a power so extensive in its reach over our foreign relations could not be properly conferred on any other than the executive department will admit of little doubt. That it should be exclusively confined to that department without any participation of the Senate in the functions (that body being conjointly intrusted with the treaty-making power) is not so obvious. Probably the circumstance that in all foreign governments the power was exclusively confined to the executive department, and the utter impracticability of keeping the Senate constantly in session, and the suddenness of the emergencies which might require the action of the Government, conduced to the establishment of the authority in its present form. It is not, indeed, a power likely to be abused, though it is pregnant with consequences often involving the question of peace or war. And, in our own short experience, the revolutions in France and the revolutions in South America have already placed us in situations to feel its critical character and the necessity of having at the head of the Government an Executive of sober judgment, enlightened views, and firm and exalted patriotism.

Chancellor Kent says (1 Kent, 284):

> The President is the constitutional organ of communication with foreign powers and the efficient agent in the conclusion of treaties; but the consent of two-thirds of the Senators present is essential to give validity to his negotiations.

Mr. Justice McLean said (Williams v. Suffolk Insurance Company, 13 Peters, 415):

> There can be no doubt that when the executive branch of the Government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country it is conclusive on the judicial department, and in this view it is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the court to determine, whether the Executive be right or wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions he has decided the question. Having done this under the responsibility which belonged to him, it is obligatory on the people and the Government of the Union. (See Duran v. Hollins, 4 Blatch., Circuit Court, 448, opinion by Mr. Justice Nelson.)

Professor Pomeroy, section 671, third edition, says:

> The President is the sole organ of communication between our own and all other governments. Foreign ministers and ambassadors are accredited to him; to him they present their credentials and pay their formal official visits. The communications which they make, and the negotiations which they conduct, are, in fact, made and conducted to and with the Secretary of State, but only as that officer is the direct and personal organ of the President. All replies of the Secretary are supposed to be suggested by the Chief Magistrate, and he may, and doubtless often does, take an actual and leading part in the negotiation. Our own ministers are nominated by the President. When appointed they communicate alone with the Executive through the State Department. Instructions are sent to them, dispatches forwarded, demands made, claims insisted on, principles adopted and enforced as the President deems proper. How far he will actually interfere with the Secretary of State, and how far leave that officer to the exercise of his own discretion, must depend upon his own sense of duty and propriety and the completeness of his own convictions.
> SEC. 672. Over all these proceedings the Congress has absolutely no control. The correspondence and negotiations may be, and generally are, conducted secretly; and although it is customary for the President to communicate dispatches to the legislature, this is never done until after their transmission, and, if necessary, they may be indefinitely withheld when the President deems that the public interests require it. Congress may pass resolves in relation to questions of an international character, but these can only have a certain moral weight; they have no legal effect; they can not bind the Executive. The necessity for this is evident. Negotiations generally require a certain degree of secrecy; one mind and will must always be more efficient in such matters than a large deliberative assembly. The President has thus intrusted to him a most momentous power, and one which he can not entirely delegate. Our foreign ministers must undoubtedly use their own judgment and discretion within narrow limits, but in all important matters they receive definite and positive instructions from home. The magnitude of this function may be easily illustrated. The President can not declare war; Congress alone possesses this attribute. But the President may, without any possibility of hindrance from the legislature, so conduct the foreign intercourse, the diplomatic negotiations with other governments, as to force a war, as to compel another nation to take the initiative; and that step once taken, the challenge can not be refused. How easily might the Executive have plunged us into a war with Great Britain by a single dispatch in answer to the demands of the British cabinet made in relation to the affair of the Trent. How easily might he have provoked a condition of active hostilities with France by the form and character of the reclamations made in regard to the occupation of Mexico.
> I repeat that the Executive Department, by means of this branch of its power over foreign relations, holds in its keeping the safety, welfare, and even permanence of our internal and domestic institutions. And in wielding this power it is untrammeled by any other department of the Government; no other influence than a moral one can control or curb it; its acts are political, and its responsibility is only political.
> SEC. 673. But the other branch of this Executive function—the treaty-making power—is even more important. The language by which this authority is conferred and described is peculiar. The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided that two-thirds of the Senators present concur. All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land. The President must, of course, take the initiative in making all treaties.
> Congress, as such, has nothing to say in the matter. As a treaty is necessarily the result of negotiation, and as such negotiation is exclusively within the province of the President, the Senate having not the least authority to communicate with a foreign government, it is absolutely impossible for that body to dictate a treaty or to force the Chief Magistrate into any particular line of action. He must negotiate the treaty, make all the stipulations, determine all the subject-matter, and then submit the perfected convention to the Senate for ratification or rejection. They must take his finished work and approve or disapprove.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. BACON] seemed to think it extraordinary and novel that the President in exercising this constitutional power to conduct our foreign relations, should send delegates or representatives to the Moroccan conference. Where can there be found any warrant for denying that right? I think the Senator did not deny the right. We have been engaged in conferences before.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection.

Mr. BACON. I desire not to do so. I prefer to answer the Senator afterwards, if I have an opportunity, rather than to take it up by piecemeal. Therefore I only interrupt him in this instance because he suggests what he understands to be my position, and it will require some little more elaboration than to answer categorically. So I will not now interrupt the Senator, but I will endeavor, if I have the opportunity, to express as fully and as clearly as I can what is my exact position about this matter.

Mr. SPOONER. But I think I misstated the Senator's position. I must correct it. Of course it was an inadvertence. The Senator did not deny the right of the President.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a brief communication that came in my mail this morning relating to the matter of the unfinished business I should like to have read, and then I will ask consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
THE BOURSE, ROOM 248,
Philadelphia, January 22, 1906.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Merchant Marine Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you that at the thirty-sixth annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, held in Washington January 16–18, 1906, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the National Board of Trade approves of the Senate bill No. 529 as the best means now practicable before the country for the improvement of the merchant marine, and urges its approval by Congress, and further, the committee approves the postponement of the time of application for the present navigation laws as to the Philippines to July 1, 1909, as recommended in the Senate bill above referred to."

Very truly, W. R. TUCKER, Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside until the Senator from Wisconsin concludes his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Wisconsin concludes his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I was saying when interrupted that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] did not deny the power of the President to send representatives to the conference at Algeciras, but he very greatly deprecated openly here, pending the assembling of the conference, their being sent as a violation of our national traditions and a dangerous departure from the principles of Washington's Farewell Address, which I support and defend.

Mr. President, I think in authorizing Ambassador White and Mr. Gummeré, our minister to Morocco, to attend this conference the President not only acted entirely within his constitutional capacity, but acted entirely in the interest of the country and in just obedience to the plain demands of the situation.

The Senator seemed to be afraid of international conferences. I do not share that fear, Mr. President. We have had numerous conferences. If we maintain our position internationally, which, of course, we will, with the lapse of years we will be called upon often, doubtless, to send representatives to conferences abroad. I assert, without fear of successful challenge, that that in no wise countervails the doctrines of Washington; that that in no wise involves a committal of this Government to entanglement with foreign governments upon purely foreign questions.

The treaty with Morocco of 1880, manifestly in the interest of the United States for the protection of our citizens, Mr. President, had its birth in a conference—the conference of Madrid. What harm has come from that?

We were represented in a conference called by Germany, which met at Berlin November 15, 1884. Fourteen countries were represented, including the United States. After a long session a treaty was agreed to relative to commerce, navigation, etc., in the Kongo Basin. We did not sign the treaty.

The framers of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution did not intend to create a baby nation or a hermit nation. They said in the Declaration of Independence what their purpose was, and the framers of the Constitution carried it out. Once in a while it is worth referring to:

WE, therefore, the REPRESENTATIVES of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, IN GENERAL CONGRESS, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly PUBLISH and DECLARE, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be FREE AND INDEPENDENT States; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES, THEY HAVE FULL POWER TO LEVY WAR, CONCLUDE PEACE, CONTRACT ALLIANCES, ESTABLISH COMMERCE, AND TO DO ALL OTHER ACTS AND THINGS WHICH INDEPENDENT STATES MAY OF RIGHT DO.

Did the framers of the Constitution whittle off anything from the measure of national power outlined in the Declaration of Independence? On the contrary, Mr. President, as the Supreme Court of the United States decided, they conferred upon the President (to negotiate) and upon the Senate (to ratify or reject) the whole treaty-making power known to international law and governments, except so far as specific provisions of the Constitution would take it away. We have a constitutional power to enter into a treaty of alliance. Who says "nay?" It is against the policy of this Government to make such treaties, but I speak not of expediency; I speak of power. I have heard it suggested if not declared here that the United States has no power under the Constitution to maintain a suzerainty or a protectorate. Why not? Where is that taken out of the power which inheres in a nation? Where is that taken out of the treaty-making power which the Supreme Court of the United States speaks of in this wise? I will stop to read it:

That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and the governments of other nations is clear. It is also clear that the protection which should be afforded to the citizens of one country owning property in another, and the manner in which that property may be transferred, devised, or inherited, are fitting subjects for such negotiation and regulation by mutual stipulations between the two countries.

That touches the Morocco treaty of 1880, which was in part negotiated for that purpose, as my friend from Ohio and other Senators will remember.

As commercial intercourse increases between different countries, the residence of citizens of one country within the territory of the other naturally follows, and the removal of their disability from alienage to hold, transfer, and inherit property in such cases tends to promote amicable relations. Such removal has been within the present century the frequent subject of treaty arrangement. The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids—

Of course not—

or a change in the character of the Government—

Of course not—

or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent.

But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country. (De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S.)

That is not new, but it shows that in the later days the highest judicial tribunal of the land—and there is none greater in the world—measures the power of this Government under the Constitution as the framers of the Declaration of Independence measured it in that immortal document.

Mr. President, we are not a hermit nation; we can not be. I am not a jingo. I adhere strictly to the Washington doctrine of no entangling alliances. I would expect to be in accord in most instances with my friends on the other side in keeping our Government, as far as may be consistent with its dignity and self-respect, free from international complications. But I insist that all the power given by the Constitution to the President as to the conduct of our foreign intercourse and relations, including the negotiation of treaties, and including conferences such as are here criticised, should be put forth whenever and wherever American citizens in any lawful business or upon any lawful errand are to be protected in their liberty, or in their ownership of property, and wherever commercial interests of the United States are to be safeguarded, and of the exercise of this constitutional function, as to occasion, time, and method, the Executive is the judge. I take it that as the years go by, as we grow in strength and power and wealth, in commerce and the esteem of the nations, as generous, patient, just, and peace-loving, occasions will arise oftener than hitherto when it will seem to the Executive of the country wise that this Government shall be represented in foreign conferences, not to deal with foreign politics, not to entangle us, not to violate in any manner the doctrine of Washington, but to conserve American interests, and to prevent by kindly offices, friendly action, and well-deserved international influence, war between nations at amity with us.

The United States has been a leader in a way in an attempt, Mr. President, to bring about as far as possible adjustment of controversies between nations without war. It is not beyond reasonable belief that Ambassador White, one of the ablest, most experienced and skilled diplomats in the service of this country, and his associate may at the right time, under instructions from the President, without in anywise jeopardizing our international status, in some way contribute to the peaceful issue of this conference.

Treaties with the Barbary States, Morocco included, are not new to us. They began about the time the United States began.

When we were colonies, Mr. President, and had a considerable commerce for those days in the Mediterranean, Great Britain, the mother country, protected our commerce, because it was hers, from the Barbary States pirates. When we had achieved our independence from Great Britain and were thrown upon our own resources, the Barbary pirates killed our commerce and took into slavery our sailors, perpetrated every crime and cruelty known to the brigand and the pirate. We asked France to incorporate in a treaty a stipulation to protect our Mediterranean commerce from the incursions and violence of the Barbary States. France declined, but offered to use her good offices. So, Mr. President, it went along until 1787, when we bought a treaty with several of the Barbary States, including Morocco, for consideration—money, including presents.

Mr. MONEY. Cash?

Mr. SPOONER. Cash; yes; and presents, in order that ships carrying our flag and manned by our sailors might navigate the sea with our commerce in safety.

So treaties were made with the other Barbary States. One was made in 1836 with Morocco. I will not take time to refer to it. Then came the treaty of 1880, the result of the conference at Madrid. I think there are not ten Senators in this Chamber who are now listening to this debate who have not forgotten that there ever was a conference at Madrid. I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] whether he remembers it?

Mr. ALLISON. I had for the moment forgotten it.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, the Senator was here. I think I had not known of it until this subject came up, and yet there were, I suppose, timid Senators who, in the inception of that performance, saw danger to Washington's policy of nonentanglement. That treaty was executed by all of the powers represented at Algeciras.

I suppose it will not be asserted here that the programme of this conference embraced subjects of necessity involving international politics, or that it did not embrace subjects covered by the existing treaty, of concern to us, and possibly, Mr. President, calling for a revision of the treaty. I can not agree to the theory upon which the Senator from Georgia bases his criticism, that we are to send, no matter what American interests may be involved, no representatives to foreign conferences to conserve our interests and promote the general peace, lest we become enmeshed in foreign political intrigue or entangling alliance. Such a contention seems an assertion by ourselves to the world that we do not trust our own Government to exercise constitutional powers; that we either will not know the limit of our own safety or will knowingly disregard it. It happens to be true, Mr. President, in this very case that but for the acceptance of the invitation by the United States no conference would have been held, for two of the large powers refused to attend the conference at all if all the signatories to the Madrid treaty did not accept.

Mr. BACON. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. SPOONER. I know it, and I know it in the same way the Senator can know it if he goes to the trouble to which I have gone to find it out.

Mr. BACON. I suppose the Senator will not hesitate to give the source of his authority. That is all I want to know

Mr. SPOONER. Well, my authority is good. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. In other words, the authority is such as we would all recognize.

Mr. SPOONER. It is authority which would satisfy. It is not the President of the United States, but an authority which would satisfy any Senator on this floor.

If a conference were called to deal with Manchuria and all the governments interested in Manchuria were requested to attend with a programme indicating what would be there considered—that would be a very delicate conference doubtless; more combustible in its nature than this little affair at Algeciras—I wonder if the Government of the United States ought to stay away. We have treaty rights in Manchuria; we have in Manchuria one of the finest treaties, commercial in its character, ever made with a government; we have international servitudes, rights of navigation, residence, etc., in Manchuria. What a dignified and impressive spectacle it would be for the United States, nearer in its possessions to China than most governments, with an absolutely inexpressible interest in the Orient, to sit at home while a conference of other powers was dealing with Manchuria! We would send a representative there guarded by instructions to watch the interests of the United States, to hear the views expressed by the representatives of other governments, to get what one can not get by reading documents the real motives and schemes and dangers, instructed to withdraw or cease to participate by vote when some matter arose, if any did, falling within the category which our President and Secretary of State in their instructions would easily define as prohibited subjects.

I can not bring myself to the belief that there is any tradition of the United States, as there is no constitutional limitation, which makes it wise to determine, if we had the power to do it, that never hereafter shall the United States be represented at a conference abroad if it covers in its programme the consideration not only of our interests and the interests of our citizens, but also may involve a political question in which we are not interested.

I do not find in Washington's Farewell Address any support, as others in perfect good faith seem to do, for criticism of the action of the Executive in sending representatives to the conference at Algeciras. Of course, this is an honest difference of opinion. President Washington laid down general rules, which in his opinion should characterize in the future the general conduct of our foreign relations and intercourse, and he expressed his views in sentences which have become maxims of our national philosophy upon the subject. Out of the knowledge of his day as to our relations of hostility to one great country and peculiar friendship to another, and the situation which had been evolved from it, he spoke. He said:

> The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible.

It is a far cry from this temperate and wise attitude to the proposition that we should entirely abstain from attending to our own business abroad lest we find ourselves unable to abstain from unduly meddling with other people's business. Even the language of Washington involves the possibility that the country could not conduct its foreign affairs without having some political relation with other countries, for he says:

> We should have with them as little political connection as possible.

What he evidently had in mind was alliances more or less permanent in form. He says:

> Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It seems quite impossible to apply this language to any European conference at which this Government has ever been or ever will be represented. Applied to the conference at Algeciras, or any others which we are likely to attend, the language certainly does not fit. The quoted language is his argument in support of the conclusion which follows it, thus:

> It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it, for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. * * * But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

That he was dealing with a situation then existing and with which he was ill content and guarding the country against permanent alliance, is indisputably clear from this language, which follows:

> Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

As a nation we have kept, are keeping, and doubtless will continue to keep far within the scope of President Washington's reasoning and admonition.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, who hit upon the psychological moment for successful intervention to bring to an end the terrible war between Russia and Japan, can be trusted to hit upon the psychological moment when the safety of this Government demands that Ambassador White and Mr. Gummere shall withdraw from or cease to vote in the Algeciras conference. I am ready to assume that the President and his accomplished and very able Secretary of State are looking after their business and know what their duty is, and that they will do it. The Senate is bound to indulge, I think, in that assumption.

But, Mr. President, I beg permission to read from the address something further which is pertinent to this discussion:

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment—

These are words of truth and soberness which no citizen ought for one moment to forget, in official or in private life—

The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people—

Mark this—

If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Mr. President, if it be true that the Constitution vests in the President the sole power and responsibility, save as to the MAKING of treaties, for the conduct of our foreign relations, George Washington bids the Senate as well as the House of Representatives, "Hands off."

A President is not liable to injunction, although a President is subject to punishment in the proper case under the Constitution, but within his sphere of constitutional action he is free as the air in the exercise of his discretion. and the Senate ought not, and especially in this delicate matter of foreign relations, to invade that jurisdiction, any more than it should permit its jurisdiction to be invaded by an Executive.

SANTO DOMINGO.

I come now to the consideration, Mr. President, of the charge made not alone by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but by many of his colleagues, and by a portion of the press, that the President in the conduct of our foreign relations has as to the miscalled "modus vivendi" alleged to exist between this Government and Santo Domingo usurped a power with which he is not clothed by the Constitution. It is not susceptible of doubt that a President may not lawfully put in operation as a treaty any understanding or agreement embraced by the word "treaty," as used in the Constitution, without precedent ratification of it by this body. Pending the action of this body upon a proposed treaty an attempt by the President to carry it into execution would be beyond his power and an act of usurpation indefensible from any standpoint. Such a charge, therefore, is a very serious one.

My purpose is now to consider the question whether the President has, in the slightest degree, gone beyond his power and duty in anything which he has done since the adjournment of the extraordinary session of the Senate in respect to the Republic of Santo Domingo.

I have a right, of course, to say that the President negotiated a treaty or a protocol for a treaty with Santo Domingo and sent it to the Senate. I have no right to say, Mr. President, what the attitude of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate was toward it; what amendments, if any, they proposed to it, or how far, if at all, the debates in the Senate were in nonapproval of one or more of the positions taken by the President in urging its ratification. All that I have no right to touch upon in the open session of the Senate. The arguments by which such a treaty was supported or opposed are as if never uttered, as I speak here to-day.

Under that proposed treaty the United States, disclaiming any purpose to acquire territory in Santo Domingo, avowing its friendliness to the Republic and the spirit in which it engages to attempt an adjustment of the obligations of the Santo Domingo Government, first, by investigation and determination, through American instrumentalities or a commission or commissions appointed in connection with creditor governments, of the justice of asserted indebtedness, and, this done, their payment out of revenues collected by the United States through American officials appointed by the President at the custom-houses of Santo Domingo in the various ports, paying 45 per cent of the customs collected to the Government for its support and holding in trust 55 per cent for application in equitable proportions to the payment of debts found honestly due by Santo Domingo, the latter Government in the meantime agreeing not to incur further indebtedness or to increase the customs, etc., pending the execution of the treaty. This is a very general, but I think adequate, statement for my present purpose.

The Senate declined to act upon the treaty, but adjourned for the long vacation, leaving it on the Calendar. What, Mr. President, was the danger in this situation, and what were the power and the duty of the President in respect of it should it arise? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] the other day, in a powerful and eloquent speech, dealt somewhat with the character of the claims against Santo Domingo, and he dealt also with the precedents illustrating the policy of this Government, limiting the governmental collection, by force, of claims of its citizens to such as are based upon torts. That is the doctrine which has been constantly sustained by our Department, as I recollect it. That is, however, not a principle of international law, as I understand it.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to interrupt him for a second, Secretary Seward says it is in one of the illustrations I gave.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is right. But, Mr. President, Lord Palmerston, speaking for England, said it was not. Every government has held itself free to pursue its own course and policy in respect of that matter, as I understand it.

At any rate, this is true: The debts of Santo Domingo were mainly obligations of the government, not of citizens of one government due to citizens of another government; and out of the "Venezuela blockade," if it may be called a blockade, established by three governments—England, Germany, Italy—with their war ships, had come a reference of the matter to The Hague. They had made a demonstration of force, and their claims were not claims sounding in tort, as I understand, save in small degree. The matter was referred to the great international tribunal at The Hague, our claims among the rest, and the international tribunal, so far from asserting as a principle of international law that contractual claims can not be collected by force, delivered a judgment or a decree giving precedence to those governments which had "levied execution" by war ships, as I said on a former occasion, thereby putting a premium upon the swift naval action of creditor governments everywhere in such cases.

When the Senate had adjourned there came from Santo Domingo, to the President undoubtedly, the cablegram read by the Senator from South Carolina:

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

Under pressure foreign creditors and domestic peril Dominican Government offers to nominate—

That is an obvious misuse of the word "nominate" by the minister—

a citizen of the United States receiver southern ports pending ratification protocol, four northern ports to be administered under the award. Forty-five per cent total shall go to the Dominican Government, fifty-five to be deposited in New York for distribution after ratification. Creditors to agree to take no further steps in the meantime and receiver to have full authority to suspend importers' preferential contracts. Italian, Spanish, German, and American creditors, except the Improvement (company)— accept unconditionally. Belgian, French representatives will recommend acceptance. Some modus vivendi absolutely necessary. I am ready, if desired, to start for Washington, D. C., 28th, to explain details and modifications of plan obtainable; the whole matter can be held open during my absence.

Which is an American claimant—

Foreign creditors could only "press" so as to disturb the status through their governments.

What reply should the President have made to that proposition? What action should the President have taken in that situation, if any?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. SPOONER. I was not asking for an answer, but the Senator evidently wants to give one——

Mr. TILLMAN. Go ahead and give it yourself.

Mr. SPOONER. And I invite him to make one.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand, the treaty having been negotiated and submitted to the Senate, it was in our keeping and no longer in charge of the President. We had not acted, but had adjourned without action, and, as I understand the limitations of the President's power in connection with treaties, he should have said: "I am powerless to do anything without usurpation."

Mr. SPOONER. It is a fortunate thing that the Senator from South Carolina did not happen to be President just at that time.

What did the President do with the treaty? The Senator is absolutely right when he says the treaty had been sent by the President to the Senate. He is absolutely right when he says that when the Senate adjourned the treaty was still pending in the Senate. He is absolutely right when he says that the President had no power to put in operation in any way the treaty—absolutely correct. And yet, Mr. President, he is absolutely wrong from every possible standpoint, if I can understand the situation, when he contends that the President has, in any respect, put in operation the treaty. The Senator from South Carolina, ordinarily exceedingly clear of perception, seems in some way not to be able or willing to see the situation as it is outlined and clearly shown by the very documents to which he resorts as a basis of condemning the President for an alleged usurpation. The Senator seems unwilling to see the right. I do not know why. It is not natural to him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps the Senator is so prejudiced that he can not see the right. I will not say that, for I do not believe it; but the Senator's mind is perverse on this subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. A little hard-headed.

Mr. SPOONER. A little perverse in his judgment upon this question.

What could the President do in that situation? The Senator did not answer the question which he rose to answer. He says that the President ought not to have done something that the President did not do, which affords me no——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not nearly so skillful in dialectics and in making special pleas as is the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. There it is again—"special pleas."

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I have an unfortunate habit of calling things by their names, even in the Senate. The Senator tries to befuddle the situation. I want to ask the Senator now will he deny——

Mr. SPOONER. I myself wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me ask my question.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want any Yankee answers—answering questions with questions. However, the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no. But I will ask a question. What, if anything, would the Senator from South Carolina have had the President do in response to this telegram?

Mr. TILLMAN. I told the Senator that in my view the President could do nothing, because the arrangement which was indicated in that cablegram could not be carried out without usurpation of authority, inasmuch as the Senate had refused to grant that authority by ratifying the treaty; the treaty was in the hands of the Senate, where it belonged, and unless something brand-new occurred in the affairs of Santo Domingo, the President was not warranted in doing what he did.

Mr. SPOONER. I accept that answer. I think that is the best I can do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly I may give the Senator a better one a little later.

Mr. SPOONER. A "brand-new situation" did develop.

Mr. TILLMAN. In what way?

Mr. SPOONER. This cablegram shows it. He was notified by Santo Domingo of foreign pressure and of domestic peril, which was not the situation when the Senate adjourned, with proposal to appoint an American nominated by the President to collect revenues to be held pending action by the Senate on the treaty—and that with this creditors would be satisfied. Would the Senator have had our ships withdrawn from Santo Domingo? He complained the other day because they were not. Would he have had them withdrawn from Santo Domingo when the Senate adjourned?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator contend that there were any American citizens there whose lives were in jeopardy, or any facts to show it?

Mr. SPOONER. There were undoubtedly American citizens there. I know nothing definite upon that subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. You had better get some facts and not guess.

Mr. SPOONER. I know this: I know it is for the President to say where our ships shall be.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not dispute that proposition at all, but——

Mr. SPOONER. And I know another thing, and I think the American people will see it, that the President would have been unfaithful to the people of the United States and to the interests of this Government had he withdrawn our ships from Santo Domingo. Why? Suppose they had been withdrawn, Mr. President. How long, under The Hague decision on the Venezuelan claims, would it have been before every harbor and custom-house in Santo Domingo would have been in charge of a foreign official, sustained by a foreign war ship?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have the debts of Santo Domingo been submitted to The Hague tribunal?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say they had been.

Mr. TILLMAN. But you alluded to The Hague decision as giving the President warrant for this action, or rather the Senator assumes that if we had withdrawn our war ships and left the Santo Domingo people to take care of themselves, which I think it was our duty to do, foreign war ships would have seized the ports. Why do not foreign war ships seize the ports of South American republics which are in debt?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me get through.

Mr. SPOONER. I prefer the Senator should be through.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is such a discourteous remark that I am through.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not intend to be discourteous, but I want to finish what I have to say. I will again ask the Senator the question which he did not answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, ask it again and I will try to answer it.

Mr. SPOONER. Would the Senator have had the President on the adjournment of the Senate, leaving the treaty unacted upon, withdraw the war ships?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not care where the war ships were, provided they were not there to collect this money, which they had no right to collect.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, Mr. President, the President knew, as every intelligent man in this country knows, that if those war ships had been withdrawn their places would have been speedily taken by the war ships of other governments for the enforcement of their claims against Santo Domingo, to help to enforce the collection of the indebtedness, the greater part of which can not be regarded as honest. The President did two things through the Secretary of War, in response to the request of Santo Domingo. He recommended Colonel Colton to collect the revenues, and a bank in New York for the deposit of the money.

It has been shown to the Senate, and it is not denied by anyone, that during fifty years, at least, if not more, the rapidly succeeding revolutions in Santo Domingo have had their heart and inspiration in the custom-houses—revolutions not for liberty, but for money.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now will the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. The presence of American war ships there up to the time of this dispatch had helped bring about a different situation, enabling the men of Morales to collect the revenues of the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now that Mr. Morales is gone, who has got it?

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask a question right here. The Senator mentioned Mr. Morales. I wish to ask him what harm would have come to us, or the Monroe doctrine either, if the foreign war ships had seized those ports and collected those debts?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not suspect that the Senator from South Carolina would see any harm in it, but the Senator forgets that Santo Domingo is to-day no farther from the soil of the United States, over which floats the flag of the United States, than Cuba was when the Spanish-American war broke out. I do not know more of the American people than the Senator from South Carolina does; I do not know as much of the southern people as the Senator does, but I think I know that the American people will not submit to-day to having within the sight of our flag, floating over our own soil, the war ships of half a dozen foreign governments indefinitely located in the harbors of Santo Domingo collecting the revenues to pay indefinite indebtedness, much of it dishonest or unconscionable. The portion of the people who would first rise in opposition to that situation would be the people of the South.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has not yet brought out the bugaboo, but it is undoubtedly coming—this sawdust-stuffed doll of foreigners seizing American ports and collecting debts by their war ships. But I want to say to the Senator that I believe that all that this Government will ever have to do under any conditions like those will be to serve notice on Europe—combined Europe, if necessary—that the Monroe doctrine as Monroe himself enunciated it is in full force and vigor and that 85,000,000 people are ready to enforce it.

Mr. SPOONER. Frankness requires me to say that that has nothing whatever to do with what I was talking about.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, of course.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina can not inveigle me into any discussion with him, nor can any other Senator about the Monroe doctrine in connection with this Santo Domingo treaty. I am for the Monroe doctrine as Monroe proclaimed it, and as the country has accepted it, and as other countries have respected it. It is no part of international law. It is a national doctrine. It is an American doctrine. It is a doctrine that answers for this country all that the balance of power answers for abroad. It is a doctrine that amounts to something or nothing, as the war power of the United States is or is not behind it. It is a doctrine which is dear to the American people. It is a doctrine which they cherish and which they will see enforced. France goes to punish an insult in Venezuela, and France first assures the United States that she respects the Monroe doctrine. Italy, Germany, England send their ships to Venezuela, first, however, notifying the United States of a purpose to observe the Monroe doctrine. I do not intend to become involved in an attempt to sustain any amendment to it or any alleged corollary of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not stretch it, either.

Mr. SPOONER. The doctrine in itself is doctrine enough for the American people, and as it was made and as it has been kept it will be enforced, Mr. President.

The question I put was this: Would the American people be satisfied to discover some morning that five or six foreign governments, having filed in the State Department each a notice that they respect the Monroe doctrine, had sailed their war ships into the harbors of Santo Domingo, there to remain for an indefinite period, within 90 miles of our own soil and flag, for the collection of twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars of alleged indebtedness?

Mr. TILLMAN. Why indefinite, pray?

Mr. SPOONER. They would remain there until they had collected sufficient customs revenue (and they would do it in their own way) to support the Government, probably poorly, and to pay $33,000,000 of claims, a large part of which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] the other day demonstrated were fictitious.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Wisconsin really and honestly believe that any nations in Europe, no matter how many, would dare go to Santo Domingo and seize its ports if the Secretary of State of the United States warned them that this Government would not permit it?

Mr. SPOONER. Ah!

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, answer "Yes" or "No," please.

Mr. SPOONER. That begs the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Ah, yes. You are begging it, too.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is more enthusiastic than he is courteous just now.

Mr. TILLMAN. You accused me of begging the question. I thought I might make the same charge.

Mr. SPOONER. What I mean by "begging the question" is, that assumes that the Secretary of State would have the right under the law of nations to send notice to those foreign governments, to which they would be bound to give attention, that our doctrine must be their doctrine, under penalty of war; that no force should be used to collect contract obligations. The foreign governments would not listen to such a notice.

Moreover, Mr. President, which would the American people prefer? Would they prefer that the President should, without usurpation, violating no provision of the Constitution, aid in maintaining a status there until the Senate had acted upon this treaty, or withdraw his war ships and send a futile notice and involve this country in war?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator right here, if he will permit me, whether the President himself did not bring about this status?

Mr. SPOONER. What status?

Mr. TILLMAN. The status in Santo Domingo, which the Senator says the President is maintaining.

Mr. SPOONER. What status?

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it not the status contemplated in the treaty?

Mr. SPOONER. It is not the status contemplated in the treaty.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator knows we can not discuss the treaty in public.

Mr. SPOONER. I will discuss the treaty in public.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then will the Senator from Wisconsin allow some others to do the same?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia, and then I will finish what I wish to say.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will not object to my stating what he knows, but which some people may not, that the treaty has been made public.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; it has been made public.

Mr. BACON. So any man can discuss it.

Mr. SPOONER. It has not only been made public, but the President discusses it in his annual message. It is perfectly proper to discuss the treaty, observing some limitations.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the Senator would show wherein the present situation differs from the condition contemplated by the treaty?

Mr. SPOONER. That is just what I intend to do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will listen, and I hope I will be able to make my meaning intelligible to him. But, Mr. President, here came this message. The Senator scouts the advent of foreign war ships. One came.

Mr. TILLMAN. Forty would not make any difference.

Mr. SPOONER. And that one would have stayed, but for the arrangement which the Senator denounced as an usurpation and putting into force this treaty, and others would have followed, for other creditor nations would not have suffered one alone to appropriate the revenues of Santo Domingo.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I simply wish to ask a question for instruction.

Mr. SPOONER. There are very few men who can instruct the Senator. I am not one of them.

Mr. RAYNER. Did not precisely the same condition prevail in Venezuela? Venezuelan forts were bombarded, Venezuelan war vessels were sunk, and we never interfered for a moment when the German ambassador sent word that they did not intend a permanent occupation of Venezuelan territory. I wish to read just a few words of the communication on that subject:

> We declare especially that under no circumstances do we consider in our proceedings the acquisition or the permanent occupation of Venezuelan territory.

Was not the same thing done precisely at Corinto? Did we interfere with the English Government sending war ships and absolutely taking possession of the town of Corinto?

I interrupt the Senator solely for this purpose: My argument that I made some days ago was based on the proposition that temporarily taking possession of custom-houses is not a permanent occupation of territory.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not denying that, nor shall I do so.

Mr. RAYNER. But in both cases where the Governments assured us that they did not intend permanently to occupy the territory we desisted. Suppose we had notified the Belgian and Italian Governments that we desired to know from them whether they intended to take permanent possession of the territory of Santo Domingo, and they had given us assurances that they did not intend permanently to occupy Santo Domingo, does the Senator think we ought to have interfered and prevented the temporary possession of the custom-houses and occupied a different position from what we did in Nicaragua and Venezuela?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not discuss with the Senator the proposition that the taking possession of a custom-house, under an award or without it, for the purpose of collecting a debt is beyond the international legal right of a foreign government. But everything in this situation distinguishes morally and otherwise this case from the Venezuelan case and the Sorento case, in my judgment.

In the first place it is distinguishable in this respect, that there was a treaty pending between the United States and Santo Domingo, well known to these Governments. Santo Domingo was in honor bound, if possible, to maintain the status quo pending action upon that treaty, in order that if it were ratified it might be administered in accordance with the purpose which led to its negotiation. Santo Domingo could not without dishonor permit a change in that status and permit foreign governments to take possession of the custom-houses, so that when the Senate ratified the treaty, if it did, we would find an entirely changed situation, and the custom-houses, which, under the treaty, we were to administer for all the creditors, being administered by a half dozen other nations, each for itself. That is one thing. That was an obligation of honor upon Santo Domingo and equally an obligation of honor upon us that we should maintain on our side the status.

It is no matter that Santo Domingo is poor. It is no matter that Santo Domingo is helpless. Honor required her not to permit if she could help it a changed status, and when Santo Domingo in this telegram from our minister gave us notice of her peril, advised us of her helplessness to maintain the status and asked us to act in the way outlined here, the President not only had a constitutional right to do it, but it was his duty to do it. It was his duty to this body where the treaty was pending to do it. It was his duty to the country to do it.

Did he put this treaty in operation? If so, how?

He recommended, as requested, a man whom he thought honest and capable, for appointment by Santo Domingo to collect the revenues. Through the Secretary of War he recommended a bank in which the 55 per cent set aside for creditors could safely be deposited by Santo Domingo in this country, and he gave the moral support arising from the continued presence of our war ships. "Only this and nothing more." The papers read by the Senator all show it, and that is what the President's alleged Executive order of March 28 clearly shows. I can not understand how it can be claimed otherwise. In what respect this can be said to be putting the treaty in operation is beyond my comprehension.

The Senator read from a paper that I, and perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts, was inconsistent; that I advised putting this treaty into operation.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think——

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator misunderstands the statement.

Mr. SPOONER. I am talking about the statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. The statement says the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin surrendered their preconceived opinions and agreed with the President finally.

Mr. SPOONER. I was saying the same thing, only in my own language, and while it is not as clear or as fine as that employed by the Senator from South Carolina, I prefer to use my own because I am accustomed to it.

The Senator from South Carolina, in his speech the other day, read from a dispatch from Washington to the New York Sun, dated March 28, 1905, in which, among other things, it is stated that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and certain other Senators, including Senators FORAKER and KNOX, were consulted by the President as to what should be done and agreed to what was done. It was also said as to me that I had resented the Dillingham-Sanchez protocol of January 20, 1905, and that I had inconsistently consented or advised the President to put it in substantial operation. I do not know who informed the correspondent that I had, in secret session, resented the Dillingham-Sanchez protocol, which guaranteed the territorial integrity of Santo Domingo, without any reference to ratification, and to take effect in so short a time as to preclude, considering the distance between the two countries, an intention to submit it to the Senate; but whoever told it told the truth, because I am frank to say I regarded it as an attempt to do a thing which the Executive Department or its agents had no power to do, it being, in my opinion, clearly a treaty matter.

I have never imputed to the President, however, responsibility for that protocol, nor had I ever imputed to John Hay, whose name and memory is and forever will be revered, responsibility for it.

I hope it is unnecessary for me to assert that I could not under any circumstances have advised the putting into effect, in form or substance of a treaty pending in the Senate.

I have as high an opinion of the New York Sun as the Senator expressed the other day. I read it from day to day, and value it highly. I acquit the correspondent, of course, who wrote the dispatch of any purpose to do injustice. He was wrongly informed, or misled by some one who knew the truth, but felt not at liberty to be frank about it.

I was, with others, consulted by the President in what seemed to him, and was, an emergency. He was disturbed by the situation in which he was left by the nonaction of the Senate. He did not need to be advised—and I have a right to speak of the conversation—that the treaty should not be in anywise put into operation. He was as emphatic upon the subject as any Senator here could be. I do not at all hesitate to say that I had no doubt then any more than I have now—and many others who wished only the right thing to be done concurred—that it was right for the President favorably to respond to the request of the Government of Santo Domingo to nominate or recommend an American official for appointment by that Government, to recommend a place of deposit in this country for the safe-keeping of Santo Domingo moneys sent here to abide action upon the treaty, and to enable the Santo Domingan Government, by the continued presence of our flag in that vicinity, to keep the status unchanged until the Senate met again.

I did not obtrude my advice, but when asked, I gave it. I gave it as I would have given it to a Democratic President, and I gave it as I would have given it if I had intended when the Senate met again to oppose the ratification of the treaty.

I justify the course of the President as a constitutional and prompt discharge of Executive duty in the circumstances.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator be kind enough——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me to go along and finish in this connection what I want to say, I will yield to him a little later.

Mr. TILLMAN. Right now, please.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield if the Senator insists.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has been kind enough to give us his own version of what occurred, and of course we all know that he has given us the exact facts; but I want to ask the Senator now if he will be kind enough to tell us whether or not the Executive order which I read in my speech the other day from the New York Sun is a true document or not?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not see the Executive order. I assume it to be a true document.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, if the Senator insists.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply want to read article second of the treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. I am going to read article second of the treaty myself.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not forget it, now.

Mr. SPOONER. Assuredly not.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I will remind you if you try to forget it, or if you do forget it. I want the Senator to understand that I intended no discourtesy whatever to him, but in some previous passages we have had he has had a very convenient way of dodging some questions I have asked him.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not dodged any question, Mr. President.

Now, Mr. President, the President kept the war ships there. He had a right to do it. He hoped, I suppose—and it has so turned out—that not in the least putting the treaty in operation, the utilization by Morales, on his own motion, of American citizens, although his own appointees, and the presence of war ships, would maintain that status until the Senate came together again and discussed and acted upon this treaty.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; I must, I suppose.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator contend that the status in Santo Domingo is the same as the one the President's order put into effect? What has become of Mr. Morales and his government?

Mr. SPOONER. The status is as it was when the Senate adjourned in March. No treaty ever was made or proposed to be made with Morales. The Senator can not get rid of Morales. Santo Domingo has parted with Morales, but the Senator can not.

Mr. TILLMAN. And the President of the United States can not get rid of the fact that the Morales government was a sham and a humbug, and its successor is equally liable to be overthrown to-morrow.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator interrupts me constantly with questions that are not pertinent. But I will stop to answer his question. When this Government enters into a treaty it does not enter into a treaty with the administration of another government. It is not a treaty of Theodore Roosevelt with Morales, liberator. It is a proposed treaty between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo, and whether Morales goes up or goes down, whether Caceres is killed or continues to be President, the treaty once ratified is a treaty between the two nations, and the personnel of the Governments has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. TILLMAN. So much, so good; but if the Senator will permit me, this is not a treaty that is now in force. It is a temporary arrangement——

Mr. SPOONER. Very good.

Mr. TILLMAN. A modus vivendi between the President, Theodore Roosevelt, and Mr. Morales, and the so-called or actual, de facto or de jure, President of Santo Domingo, Mr. Morales, disappears. Now, the Senator falls back on the doctrine that it is a treaty. It is first a treaty and then it is not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is inaccurate. Mr. President,

I propose to test by an examination of the proposed treaty itself the question whether it has been put in force. What does the treaty provide for? It provides that the United States shall attempt the adjustment of all the obligations of the Dominican Government, and that a commission shall be appointed to that end. Is that part of the treaty being carried out? Who will assert it? Is the United States in negotiation with any foreign government to adjust the indebtedness of Santo Domingo through commissions or otherwise? No. If the treaty were being carried out it would be.

Article second. In order to enable the United States Government to render the assistance above mentioned, it shall take charge of the existing custom-houses and those which may hereafter be created, shall name the employees necessary to their management, and shall collect and take charge of all custom-house receipts.

Is any of that article of the treaty being carried out? Is any agent of the United States collecting a dollar of customs in Santo Domingo? If so, who is he?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Under that treaty the Government of the United States was to take charge of the custom-houses in Santo Domingo. Is the Government of the United States in charge of any custom-houses in Santo Domingo? If so, what officer or appointee of the United States is in charge of any custom-house in Santo Domingo?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Is the United States collecting any revenues in Santo Domingo?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment. This obligation of the treaty requires the United States as a national entity to do these things. This treaty being in operation, the United States agents would be in those custom-houses. The United States gunboats would have a right to land marines to protect those custom-houses as such, if there were Americans in the custom-houses as our agents. Does that situation exist? Not at all. Whether the President would have a right to land marines to protect American citizens acting in a foreign country as the paid officials of that country is an entirely different proposition. And that difference exists here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; for one question, for I want to get through. Go ahead.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator if the treaty does not provide that the United States shall nominate and put in possession its own officers to collect these revenues? Is not that true?

Mr. SPOONER. The treaty provides that the United States shall take charge of the custom-houses.

Mr. TILLMAN. And put in charge American officers.

Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

Shall name the employees necessary to their management, and shall collect and take charge of all custom-house receipts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, the Senator will not deny, as a matter of fact, that that condition exists to-day.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Why does not the Senator stop? Wait now. Not officially, but by the authority of the President, acting in that great emergency which the Senator has depicted.

Mr. SPOONER. I deny absolutely that that situation exists to-day in any respect whatever. I deny that any appointee of the President of the United States is collecting a dollar of customs in Santo Domingo. I deny that the United States is in Santo Domingo. I deny that the United States has technically or otherwise control of any custom-houses in Santo Domingo.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. I deny that the United States is doing anything or has done anything which it would be required to do under this treaty if it were ratified and a binding obligation. Now, if the Senator will let me go on a moment——

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator ought to let me get in my evidence first. He asserts, he denies, but he will not let me get the fact.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, get the fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read from the order of the President just this paragraph:

The Secretary of War of the United States will present for nomination by the President of the Dominican Republic men to act in the position referred to in both the northern and southern ports. The utmost care will of course be taken to choose men of capacity and absolute integrity who, if possible, shall have some knowledge of Spanish. All the moneys collected from both the northern and southern ports not turned over to the Dominican Government will be deposited in some New York bank, to be designated by the Secretary of War, and will there be kept until the Senate has acted.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well; what of it?

Mr. TILLMAN. The treaty provides for that same thing.

Mr. SPOONER. The treaty does not provide for any such thing.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is a direct contradiction, and the people will have to read it so as to decide whether your version is right or mine.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will not see this thing as his own papers show it to be. That is the trouble. Is an officer of the United States collecting any customs in Santo Domingo?

Mr. TILLMAN. Technically, no; actually, yes.

Mr. SPOONER—

See what a ready tongue suspicion hath!

The Senator said the other day that an officer of the Army of the United States detailed by the Secretary of War is collecting revenues in Santo Domingo, when the Senator had before him the testimony of that same gentleman, Colonel Colton, that he ceased years ago to be an officer of the Army, that he had been on the civil list in the Philippines, was here on a vacation, and was absent now on leave without pay and in the service of Morales.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me? He says I have that before me. I never saw it nor heard of it. My deduction arose from the fact that the President's order required the Secretary of War to detail somebody, and Colonel Colton had been detailed. I do not know how he could be a colonel if he had not been in the Army. That is all there is in that.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator thinks once a colonel in the Army always a colonel in the Army.

Mr. TILLMAN. He is on the retired list.

Mr. SPOONER. Here is what Colonel Colton says, and there is nobody to countervail it, because it is the truth. He was asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]:

Who appointed you to your present position?

He is in charge of the collection of customs in Santo Domingo, and he himself appoints his subordinates.

Colonel COLTON. President Morales, of the Dominican Republic.
Senator MONEY. Who recommended you?
Colonel COLTON. The President of the United States.
Senator BACON. Are you an Army officer now?
Colonel COLTON. No, sir; I was in the volunteer service.
Senator MCCREARY. From whom do you draw your salary at the present time?
Colonel COLTON. From the Dominican Government.
Senator MONEY. Do you draw anything from the American Government?
Colonel COLTON. No, sir.
Senator FORAKER. Are you in the United States Army?
Colonel COLTON. No, sir.
Senator FORAKER. Have you been in the military service?
Colonel COLTON. Yes, sir; I went to the Philippines with my regiment in 1898, during the Spanish war.

* * * * * * *

Senator MCCREARY. What amount have you collected?
Colonel COLTON. In round figures we have collected during the period from April 1 to November 30, $1,445,000, of which $550,000 has been delivered to the Dominican Government as the 45 per cent due it on the terms of the modus vivendi.

The 45 per cent is more money than was annually collected hitherto, for the first time in a century, and the honest collection of that money, under circumstances which render the hold by the Government of Santo Domingo upon the custom-houses stable, is what defeated the attempted revolution by Morales, and is what led him to beg permission to leave Santo Domingo with a new President.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did the Senator ever before hear of a President attempting a revolution against his own Government?

Mr. SPOONER. He left, another took his place, and he could not retake it.

Mr. TILLMAN. True, he went to the woods, because they threatened to cut his throat, as I have been informed, and who knows how soon somebody will say to Caceres "If you do not get out we will cut your throat?" That is the kind of people over whom the Senator would have this country become guardian ad litem. We are to establish courts of bankruptcy——

Mr. SPOONER. We have not got to that yet.

Mr. TILLMAN. Take charge of assets, establish receiverships, determine what debts are honest and what are not, and all that kind of thing.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator consider that an imposition on my courtesy, or not?

Mr. TILLMAN. I consider that it is telling the truth, and I hope that is not an imposition on anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. I do.
Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.
Mr. SPOONER. Granted.
Mr. TILLMAN. I am always, as I have said, unfortunately addicted to expressing my honest opinion, and the Senator objects to my telling him what I think to be the truth.
Mr. SPOONER. I do not object to it the first time, nor the second time, nor the third time.
Mr. TILLMAN. I have said it but once. [Laughter.]
Mr. SPOONER. I read further from the testimony of Colonel Colton:

Senator MCCREARY. Where is that deposited?

Referring to the money in New York.

Colonel COLTON. In the National City Bank, of New York.
Senator MONEY. What do you do with the 45 per cent?
Colonel COLTON. We deliver it to the Dominican Government.
Senator MONEY. Where do you get your authority for the collection and disbursement of this money?
Colonel COLTON. That is done under a decree of the Dominican Government.
Senator MONEY. You act solely under the authority of that Government?
Colonel COLTON. Yes, sir.

There is the testimony, Mr. President, of a distinguished ex-officer of the Army, a man of great intelligence, a man who was appointed by Morales, upon the recommendation of the President of the United States, a man who selects his subordinates. He says he was appointed by Morales; he says he is paid by Santo Domingo and that he is entirely under the control of the Santo Domingan authorities.
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?
Mr. TILLMAN. In what way, if the Senator will permit me——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has not yielded.
Mr. SPOONER. Oh, I yield; of course I yield.
Mr. TILLMAN. In what way does Colonel Colton's status differ from that of an appointee of the President whose name is sent to us, except that Morales has confirmed the President's appointment of Colonel Colton, and sometimes, as the Senator knows, we used to reject appointments made by the President? The appointment of Colonel Colton is to all intents and purposes, as I think the Senator must acknowledge, an appointment by the President of the United States, and the work that is being done is in effect—I do not mean legally, for it may not be legally—the carrying out of the agreement in the treaty, which has been subsequently made a temporary arrangement, because the Senate refused to ratify the treaty. The agreement now is in effect the treaty itself, and it is being carried out.
Mr. SPOONER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has repeated that a number of times. It does not gain anything of credibility or strength by "damnable iteration." It was not either technically or substantially the fact when the Senator first uttered it, though he thinks it is, and it is no more so now than when he first uttered it. Who knows better whether Colonel Colton is acting under Morales or Santo Domingo than does Colonel Colton? Who knows better who pays Colonel Colton for taking charge of the collection of revenue in Santo Domingo, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina or Colonel Colton? Who knows better who appointed Colonel Colton and to whom he is responsible, the President of the United States or the Senator from South Carolina? I asserted, and I assert again, that every man on the customs roll in Santo Domingo is there directly under the Santo Domingan Government, paid by the Santo Domingan Government, controlled by the Santo Domingan Government, and susceptible to discharge any minute by the Santo Domingan Government, and entirely independent of the President of the United States.
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?
Mr. SPOONER. Yes.
Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator, in his catalogue of verbs——
Mr. SPOONER. Of what?
Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator repeated the verb "appointed," and other verbs of that kind, but he failed to say who protects Colonel Colton.
Mr. SPOONER. Well, I will tell you that.
Mr. TILLMAN. Wait a minute. I am afraid you will—but go ahead, I will wait and hear you tell it.
Mr. SPOONER. I will tell the Senator what protects Colonel Colton. I do not know whether Colonel Colton would be protected or not if the visible sign of the power of the United States were not in the waters of Santo Domingo.
Mr. TILLMAN. Ships, you mean?
Mr. SPOONER. Ships, of course, I mean. It is very likely, Mr. President, that but for the presence of our ships there Colonel Colton might not be able to continue acting for the Santo Domingan Government as the collector of customs, but that does not change the fact that from the beginning until to-day he has acted and is acting solely under Dominican authority.
Now, Mr. President, let me go on with this treaty——
Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?
Mr. SPOONER. I decline to yield, as I wish to get through.
Mr. CULBERSON. I will not interrupt the Senator.
Mr. SPOONER. I am weary, but I will yield to the Senator.
Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Wisconsin has repeated so often that the United States are not in Santo Domingo that it is with some hesitation I interrupt him for a moment, if he will permit me, to read what the President himself has said about it.
Mr. SPOONER. The Senator can do that later.
Mr. CULBERSON. It is only a paragraph.
Mr. SPOONER. The Senator can do that later.
Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.
Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

Article third: Out of the revenues which shall be collected in all the custom-houses of the Republic, the Government of the United States shall deliver to the Dominican Government a sum, which shall not be less than 45 per cent of the total amount collected—

Is that being done by the Government of the United States?
Mr. TILLMAN. It is in the treaty.
Mr. SPOONER. But it is not the situation in Santo Domingo to-day. If the treaty shall ever be ratified, it will be the situation, but it is not now—for the purpose of meeting the needs of the public service, and which the Dominican Government shall receive in monthly payments from the date of the taking possession of the custom-houses by the officials of the United States, divided into four installments in the following manner:

Forty-five per cent of the total sum collected monthly in periods ending on the 8th, 15th, 22d, and the last day of each month.

Then article 4 reads:

Article fourth: The Government of the United States will apply the 55 per cent which it retains toward the payment of
A. The employees of all the custom-houses,

Is that being carried out in Santo Domingo? Does anybody pretend that the Government of the United States has a shadow of claim or title to the money on deposit in the New York bank? Colonel Colton says, in his testimony before the committee, that it is deposited to the credit of Santo Domingo; that it can be drawn only on the joint order of the President of Santo Domingo and himself, but if he were removed it could be drawn on the single order of the President of Santo Domingo. If the treaty had been carried into effect, if we had $750,000 collected under it, Santo Domingo would have no interest in that money, but the United States would hold it in trust, to be applied as provided by the treaty and as found to be due under the various commissions which might be appointed.
Is that the situation, Mr. President? Not at all. These appointments have been made under a decree of Morales, which, until reversed by his successor, is the law of Santo Domingo, and that very decree shows that this treaty is not being carried into operation.
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?
Mr. SPOONER. I decline to yield, Mr. President.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.
Mr. SPOONER. I must get through. Here, Mr. President, is this so-called "modus," here is the decree of Morales, under which all this work is being done:

With a view to protecting all the creditors of the Republic, until the Dominican Congress—

This was presented by the Senator from South Carolina and evidently not read by him—

With a view to protecting all the creditors of the Republic, until the Dominican Congress and the Senate of the United States shall take action in regard to the convention, signed on the 7th of February of the current year by the representative of the Governments of the Dominican Republic and the United States, providing that the said convention should be latent meanwhile, and to facilitate its complete execution if it should be ratified or not to prejudice any rights if it should fail of confirmation.
The opinion of the council of secretaries of state having been heard:
Be it resolved—1. To appoint a person to receive the revenues of all the customs of the Republic, and for the greater security of the creditors of the latter it is left to the President of the United States to designate— to designate the person who shall receive the said revenues, and the Dominican executive shall confer the office on the said person, provided always that the designation made is satisfactory to the said executive.

Here is the decree, there is the recommendation, and here is the testimony of Colonel Colton that he was appointed under this decree by Morales, and yet it is claimed here that he was appointed by the President of the United States, and that the United States is collecting these revenues instead of the Republic of Santo Domingo.

2. The money collected shall be distributed in the following manner—

If the treaty were in operation, it would not be for Santo Domingo to say how the money collected should be distributed; the treaty would control that; but to-day the disposition of this money in Santo Domingo is in accordance with this decree made by President Morales, which, under their constitution, is law.

(a) Forty-five per cent to meet the expenses of the budget, (b) the necessary expenses of collecting, including the salaries of all the customs employees.

You see they are paid by decree out of the customs collected.

3. The residue, being the amount to be devoted to the payment of the debts, shall be immediately deposited in some New York bank to be designated by the President of the United States.

It was designated by the Secretary of War.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator any more, after he declined to yield me the floor a moment ago, but he must quit looking at me and making those assertions unless he wants me to ask him questions.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, ask me the question. It is a heavy penalty to pay for a look, but ask the question. [Laughter.]
